Mr. Pillsbury and his associates seem abundantly satisfied with the result of their recent trip to the north, and of their hasty and imperfect conference with such of the citizens as they were able to meet at Crookston, Grand Forks and Moorhead. They seem to be impressed with their own reasoning to such a degree that they assume that the smooth plausibilities which they presented to their audiences, have carried conviction to the minds of even the suffering farmers, and led them to believe that the hints from which they are smarting in pocket and credit are not real. The visit of Mr. Pillsbury and his friends at this time, was not without design. Considering that in a very short time, indeed on the 24th inst., there will be a general representative convention of the farmers of the Northwest, all these grievances will be discussed, and where the proofs will be adduced of the reality of the impositions which are robbing the farmer of the fruits of his toil. Mr. Pillsbury would naturally have awaited that opportunity of entering into the discussion of the matters wherein complaint is made, [illegible] it better suited his purpose to take the course which he did [illegible] summon meetings on the briefest notice, and to take such steps as would enable him to present the best side of his case, with the least opportunity of opposition. It was designed in a meeting on the 24th, and possibly to absolve Mr. Pillsbury from the necessity of appearing there where his plausibilities would be confronted by carefully compiled proofs of the many and gross injustices which through his policy are imposed upon the farmers of the district. We note in the several columns of the St. Paul and Minneapolis papers, that the elevator party are at home, singing pœans of victory over the results of their recent meetings, but they will do well to wait till the farmers' side of the question has had its innings, before exulting too loudly. We shall hope to be honored with another visit soon from Mr. P. on an occasion when he can have the best opportunity for meeting the farmers in council assembled, and of satisfying them, if he can, that they are not being systematically plundered out of a large share of their hard-earned rewards. In the meantime, since he has recently developed such a penchant for literary experiments, we might ask him to elucidate a point which has not so far been made comprehensible—except in a certain way to those who have to pay the piper—and which he has so far carefully avoided entering upon. How is it that, as shown by his quotations at Grand Forks and Minneapolis, there should be a difference of 22 cents per bushel? Why should the grain stored in a 30,000 bushel elevator be worth $6,600 more in Minneapolis than in Grand Forks? We know, of course, that the railway company puts in the very handsome tariff of 15 cents per bushel for transportation, but for what purpose or on what principle do the elevator men charge $2,150 for the handling of 30,000 bushels of grain. Of course, we are aware that according to the elevator lights, ten cents on the dollar is a mere bagatelle toe fleece a farmer out of, and that the latter has a constitutional right to be satisfied if he gets his bags back from the elevators, but all the same, the farmers don't see it in that light, and think the time is ripe for a reform in the direction of some action which will compel the elevators to a course of honest dealing.

B. H.

Grand Forks, D. T., Jan. 21.

Morris Tribune: If the Millers' Association only had been moderate in its hoggishness, had it been content to crush the life blood out of the rising industry of the Northwest slowly, the life of this gigantic monopoly would have been greatly lengthened; but as it is, the whole country is up in arms against it. From the number of independent elevators being built throughout the country, and the many places planning for direct rail connections with Duluth on the one side, or with St. Louis on the other, it is quite evident that soon there will be competition in the wheat market which the millers cannot crush. When this shall have been brought about the Association must pay the farmer what his wheat is worth or allow the grain to go elsewhere. The days of oppression are nearly ended.

There are many thousands of farmers and fruit-growers in the West who consider the Prairie Farmer an indispensable aid to them in the proper prosecution of their business. There are a great many more thousands who would be of that same opinion if they should become thoroughly familiar with the contents of the paper in its new form and under its new management. It is by all odds the best paper in and for the West, if not indeed in and for the whole country. There is, in fact, not a weak feature about it. It is a model farm and home paper in each and all of its departments. Besides mentioning its varied and instructive contents we may say that it is the handsomest and best illustrated paper of its class that we know of. Its form is the most convenient in the world, and its typography is faultless. We wish it to be found in every rural home in this community. The price is two dollars a year in advance, and every subscriber sending that amount to the publishers receives a superb map of the United States and Canada—58x41 inches—mounted on rollers. This map retails at $2. Or, if preferred, the subscriber gets his choice of several valauble books. See prospectus in another column.

Out to The Northland.

Grand Forks Herald.

While our aggrieved farmers are seeking other outlets for their products than these subordinated to the interests of monopoly, our neighbors of Manitoba are engaged in the work and with promise of early success which may, in a measure, help to solve our own difficulties. It is believed by the well-informed, that the north-eastern boundaries of the Province will be enlarged so as to give it some important ports on the Hudson Bay, including Fort York, which is now an important shipping point. This would be followed by a rapid construction of a railroad from Winnipeg to the Bay, which would at once open a market as near to Liverpool as New York is, and one which would probably make the Grand Forks market worth as much to farmers as that of Buffalo, viz: the difference between 76 cents and $1.12 per bushel for wheat. The possibilities of this new market proposed are great, and worthy of study. We have here the probably early building of the Fargo, Grand Forks & Pembina so as to connect with a Manitoba line, not to speak of other projects in this direction. Here we have the Red River navigable from Fargo down to its mouth, from which, navigation can be opened through Lake Winnipeg to the Nelson river and by that to Hudson Bay, if a ship canal be constructed around the rapids of the Nelson. The importance of this enterprise will be apparent at a glance. The only difficulty in the way of permanent commerce by this outlet, and it is considered a grave one, by many, is the winter stoppage of navagation through the Straits and the dangerous ice floes in June and July. But to the skillful and experienced mariner these are not insuperable obstacles. It is claimed by Hon. E. P. Leacock, M. P. P., who has made a thorough study of the subject, that the supposed dangers are not so great, as proved by the records of navigation at York and Moose Factory. In a period extending over 92 years at the former, and 148 at the latter point, the record shows but a few blanks, indicating that the navigation of the Hudson was almost continuous and the losses but limited. In respect to navigation the Hudson Bay company has been exceptionally fortunate. With the feasibility of bay navigation assured, the importance of opening a line or lines of communication by rail and water with the bay, cannot be overestimated. In this we are perhaps as much interested as our neighbors across the line.

Not Altogether Satisfied.

Grand Forks Herald.

From the following communications it will be seen that the wheat shipping monopoly have not satisfied everybody, by any means.

DIFFERENCE IN GRADING.

To the Editor of the Herald.

LARIMORE, Jan. 11th—In reading The Herald of yesterday in which I notice Mr. Pillsbury's assertion that they did not find many cases of under grading wheat, I have a case here of my own and can find many more for him to investigate. I drew two loads in December, 1883, and offered it to both elevators, the Northwestern and P. & H., and the best offer they made me was 62 and 63 cents. I hauled the same wheat to Grand Forks and received 80 cents. Respectfully,

J. R. COON.

St. Paul Dispatch.

It is very evident, from the universal complaints reaching us from almost all important points in the State, that something must be done to assist the wheat raisers out of the deplorable condition they are now in. There can be no doubt but they have been unmercifully preyed upon by wheat manipulators, buyers or speculators, whatever it may be the most polite to call the class who get the wheat from those who sow and reap it. We have not heretofore had the space that we have often wished for to devote to the subject, but we now hope to be able to give it more attention, as these who are first, last and all the time on the side of the people are as scarce as white owls. We think the suffering groans of the farmer while under this unbearable oppression should receive the most earnest attention of its friends. Its enemies should be made to understand that unfair dealing by private individuals or corporations must be frowned down by the public press until the great cause of complaint shall cease to exist within the reach of our circulation at least. We do not design to wage any unjust warfare upon such monopolies as the Millers' Association, with its hoard of supporters and its millions of money, attempt to override the honest tillers of the soil and openly defy resistance, we shall occasionally pay them our respects It may not be that the Association is to be blamed when its situation is looked at from a business point of view in getting wheat at the lowest possibl figure, but when it does this in the way of overpowering all opposition, of brow-beating, and with its unlimited means preventing others from coming into honest competition with it upon honest principles, to purchase the great wheat staple of our State, to the almost entire destruction of the farming interest, we cannot after we have discovered all this, sit by mutely acquiescing in the outrageous abuse. We have no hesitation in asserting that we have been, and are now on the side of the people and farmer, and shall not fail as best we can, to denounce their wholesale enemies, and redress, so far as we are able, their wrongs in this wheat question, which, when they are made odious, must cease to exist. What ever attempts are made by monopolies to prevent a competing wheat market, which will have a tendency to raise the price of the article, we shall expose and denounce until the farmers' enemies shall become as plainly to be seen as a black sheep in a flock of the white, and as the association and its army of supporters shall work to prevent a competing market by navigation from Duluth through the great lakes to the East, even so shall we think it our duty to work for it, with all consistent methods of energy, as it is plainly to be seen that the needed relief must come from this source and direction. The openly avowed purpose of the Millers Association in constructing the Minneapolis, Sault Ste. Marie & Atlantic railroad, as expressed by Mr. Washburn, its president, was to prevent a market of this kind from being built up at the port of Duluth. The Millers' Association, with the assistance of Minneapolis, have done all in their power to draw railroads into their combination to break up the Duluth market during the last season, and, not withstanding all they have done to accomplish their object, above three million bu. more wheat this season than the year previous went to Duluth for a market, to the great rejoicing of many farmers, where they found a much better and more profitable market; and although the lines of boats on the lakes were largely increased, all during this season, there was, at the close of navigation, over a million bushels of wheat still left at that port. This is something which these who handle our affairs of commerce should see, is never allowed to occur again. This wheat question will not be settled without making a great commercial centre and powerful business point somewhere in the Northwest, and we cannot believe it is for the best interest of St. Paul to remain outside of the circle which shall finally establish it. Our city must have a controling voice in its operations, and have a hand in making its location, and shaping its influence upon trade, or receive an unwelcome shock in its now thriving business. The Eastern millers are flocking to this belt after hard wheat, and they should not be left alone to form combinations with these of Minneapolis to sink the price of wheat below the cost of raising. It can be seen that the State has vital interests in this question, and the time has already arrived to guard them, and it should be well done."

Preample and Resolution of business men and wheat growers of Polk County, Minn., assembled at Fortier's Hall in the City of Crookston, Feb. 2d 1884.

WHEREAS it is generally believed and by many it is an established fact that the present elevator system as established and virtually maintained to the exclusion of all competition by the St Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba Railroad Company, along its main lines and connecting branches, has worked an irreparable injury to the country, to the great inconvenience and personal loss to a large portion of the wheat producers and business men throughout the Northwest, and particularly so to those in the Red River Valley and

WHEREAS it appears impossible through the present system to obtain a just or real value for our products, at all times and which is in effect a monopoly under whose power and influence we are and have been for years subjected and practically without a remedy to right the wrongs which are continually practiced upon the people, and,

WHEREAS we believe it would ultimately result in the grandest good to both, the railroad company, and all patrons interested, if an open competitive market was established with a liberal reduction from the present freight rates, together with terminal facilities that would make the products of this country to pass through Minneapolis and St. Paul to the markets of the world without being subjected to unnessesary, oppressive and arbitrary charges; and

WHEREAS, We are familiar with the fact that the wheat grown in the Red River Valley is superior to that grown in almost any other locality on the continent and consequently should return to its producers its comparative value, which through the present system we are unable to obtain; Therefore be it

Resolved, By this body assembled, that the urgent necessity for the immediate removal of all obstacles that are, or appear to be, in the way to the enjoyment of an open, free and unobstructed avenue from the producer to the consumer throughout to the markets of the world, offering an opportunity and encouraging competition for our products, thereby widening and extending the already high appreciation of our wheat, which would result in the establishment of a prosperous and contented people with a wealthy and prosperous Railroad. To the accomplishment of this great and important end we earnestly solicit the hearty co-operation of the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba Railroad Company, believing that they are competent to dissolve all barriers that now exist between our present untenable situation to one of prosperity and contentment Be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be furnished His Excellency, Gov. Hubbard, General Manager Manvel, the Daily Pioneer Press, Daily Globe of St. Paul, all local papers and each organized assembly throughout the Red River Valley who have for their object the general good of the country at heart to the exclusion of monopolies.

We, the undersigned, pioneer settlers of the Red River Valley, who, leaving our early homes, have endured the privations incident to the opening and settlement of a new country, only to find our hard earnings ground from us between the upper and nether millstones of great corporations, which, under mistaken systems of management have become engines of oppression where they MIGHT and SHOULD be almoners of good to all classes, and desiring to secure to ourselves the same immunities and privileges we are willing to accord to every one else viz: the peaceful enjoyment of the fruits of our labors; Do hereby organize ourselves into an association and adopt for our government the following Constitution and By Laws.

CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE I.

SEC. 1. This organization shall be known as the "Farmers Alliance of Northwestern Minnesota."

SEC. 2. The object of this association shall be the promotion and protection of the agricultural interests of this part of Northwestern Minnesota.

ARTICLE II.

SEC. 1. Any person desiring to become a member of this Association may do so by subscribing to this Constitution and By-Laws, and giving a pledge in writing to pay to the Treasurer of the Association on demand, an initiation fee of an amount equal to one cent per acre, for each and every acre of land cultivated and owned by him or her; provided that in no case shall said initiation fee be less than one dollar, and to pay such further sums as the Association may assess upon its members.

ARTICLE III.

SEC. 1. The officers of this Association shall consist of a President, Vice-President, Secretary, corresponding Secretary and Treasurer.

SEC. 2. Said officers shall be elected and serve for the term of one year from the date of their election, except those who may be elected at the time of the adoption of this constitution who shall serve until the first annual meeting of the Association as hereinafter provided such service to be rendered without compensation.

SEC. 3. The election of officers shall be by ballot, and a majority of all votes cast shall be necessary to a choice

SEC. 4. The duties of the several officers shall be such as appertain to their respective offices according to parliamentary usages, and in addition thereto they shall constitute the Executive Board of the Association.

ARTICLE IV.

SEC. 1. This constitution may be amended at any regular meeting by a two-thirds vote of the members present and voting, the proposed amendment having been submitted to the Association in writing one month previous thereto.

ARTICLE V.

SEC. 1. There may be organized under this Constitution Auxiliary Associations at such places as the Executive Board may hereafter designate.

SEC. 2. All members of said Auxiliary Associations shall become members of this Alliance upon complying with Section one of Article two.

SEC. 3. Each Auxiliary Association shall adopt its own By-Laws, and make all necessary regulations for its management not inconsistent or in conflict with this constitution.

BY-LAWS.

ARTICLE I.

SEC. 1. The regular annual meeting of this Association, for the election of officers, shall be held at Crookston, on the third Saturday in June in each year, but monthly meetings shall be held on the first Saturday of each month for the transaction of any general or special business of the society, at such places as may be determined from time to time, and special meetings may be called by the Executive Board at their discretion by publication of notice at least one week previously thereto.

SEC. 2. There shall be four standing committees as follows, viz:

One on Transportation.

One on Markets.

One on Correspondence and Publication.

One on Legislation.

SEC. 3. All standing committees shall be appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Vice-President,

SEC. 4. The duties of the standing committees shall be to consider and report on all measures or questions referred to them, and to collect and report to the Association all matters of interest and importance in their respective departments, and to recommend remedies for existing evils.

SEC. 5. These By-Laws may be amended at any regular meeting a majority of the members present voting, provided that such amendment has been submitted to the Association in writing one month previous thereto.

SEC. 5. There shall never be taxed against the Association in any one year a sum greater than 3 cents per acre for each acre said member cultivates.

SEC. 6. The Treasurer shall be required to file bonds in double the amount of monies he may handle for the faithful accounting for such monies

The Treasurer shall pay out monies belonging to this alliance only through the restriction and authority of the Executive Board signed by its President and Secretary.

A motion was made and carried that the meeting adjourn to meet at Fortier's Hall a week from next Wednesday 2 p. m., sharp.

M. R. BROWN President.
F. T. HASELTINE, Secretary.

STATE OF MINNESOTA, County of Polk, } ss. In Probate Court.

Special term held Jan. 16th, 1884.

In the matter of the estate of John H. Gray, deceased:

On reading and filing the petition of James K. Gray, administrator, setting forth the amount of personal estate that has come to his hands, and the disposition thereof; the amount of debts outstanding against said deceased and a description of all the real estate of which said deceased died seized, and the condition and value of the respective portions thereof; and praying that license be to him granted to sell the nw¼ of nw¼ Sec. 13, Township 149, Range 47, and the ne¼ of nw¼ Sec. 13, Township 149, Range 47, and lot No. 14, in block No. 3 in Hurlbut's addition to the townsite of Crookston. And it appearing by said petition that there is not enough personal estate in the hands of said administrator to pay said debts, and that it is necessary in order to pay the same, to sell all of said real estate.

It is therefore ordered that all persons interested in said estate appear before the Judge of this Court on Saturday the 29th day of February, A. D. 1884, at two o'clock p. m., at the office of the Probate Court, in the city of Crookston, in said County, then and there to show cause (if any there be) why license should not be granted to said James K. Gray, to sell said real estate according to the prayer of said petition.

And it is further ordered that a copy of this order shall be published for four successive weeks prior to said day of hearing, in the POLK COUNTY JOURNAL, a weekly newspaper printed and published at Crookston, in said county, and personally served on all persons interested in said estate, residing in said County, at least fourteen days before said day of hearing, and upon all other persons interested, according to law.

Notice of Mortgage Foreclosure Sale.

DEFAULT HAS OCCURRED IN THE CONditions of a certain mortgage made, executed and delivered by Knud Knudsen and Kate D. Knudsen, his wife, mortgagors, to Elwood S. Corser, mortgagee, which said mortgage bears date the fourteenth day of April, A. D. 1882, and was recorded on the seventeenth day of April A. D. 1882, in the office of the Register of Deeds of Polk County, in the State of Minnesota, in book "1" of mortgages on page 31. No action has been instituted at law to recover the amount secured by said mortgage.

There is claimed to be due thereon and is actually due on said mortgage at the date of this notice, the sum of five hundred dollars ($500) with interest from the fifteenth day of February, A. D. 1883, at the rate of ten (10) per cent. per annum.

The premises set forth in and conveyed by said mortgage are situated in the County of Polk in the State of Minnesota, and are as follows, to-wit: Lot seven (7) in block fourteen (14) in the village of Carman, according to the recorded plat thereof.

The said mortgage contains a full power of sale in due form of law, in case of default of payment of the said principal or interest in said mortgage specified, or any part thereof, when due. Said mortgage also contains a stipulation on the part of the said mortgagor to pay the sum of ten dollars ($10) as and for attorney's fees for the foreclosure thereof.

Whereas, default has been made in the payment of the principal sum and interest due on said mortgage, and said power of sale has become operative.

Now, therefore, notice is hereby given that by reason of said default and by virtue of the power of sale in said mortgage contained, and pursuant to the statutes in such case made and provided, the said above described mortgaged premises will be sold at public auction at the front door of the Court House, in the city of Crookston, in the County of Polk and State of Minnesota, on Saturday, the first day of March, A. D. 1884, at ten o'clock a. m. to satisfy the amount then due on said mortgage, together also with ten dollars ($10) stipulated by said mortgagors to be paid as attorney fees, and including also such costs as are allowed by law.

Dated this seventh day of January, 1884.

Public Auction Sale.

Notice is hereby given that we, the undersigned will at the Livery Stables of Terry & Collins, on the corner of Main and Fourth Street, in the city of Crookston, County of Polk, and State of Minnesota, at the front door of said stable, on said Main Street, on Saturday the first day of March A. D. 1884, at the hour of ten o'clock in the forenoon of said day, at public sale, sell the following described personal property, belonging to John B. Filiatrault, to-wit: One large grey mule about eight or nine years old, to satisfy our claim, for labor bestowed upon, and food and stabling furnished to said mule at the request of said Filiatrault on the twenty-fourth day of October A. D. 1883, who was then and now is the sole owner of said described personal property and in whose legal possession the said mule was prior to said twenty-fourth day of October A. D. 1883, and until delivered to us for the keeping and care thereof by said Filiatrault on said last named day. That the amount of our said claim herein is the sum of forty-six dollars, at the date of this notice; and that said personal property will at the time and place above named be sold at public vendue to the highest bidder therefor for cash at the time of such sale, to satisfy our said claim, and also the costs and expenses attending the said sale, and the keeping of said property until said day of sale.

'ROUND HOME.

The Board of County Commissioners will meet on Tuesday next, Feb. 12th.

Wheat still holds at 70 cents in this market. In Grand Forks the roller mills pay 85 cents.

Senator Vest, from the committee on public lands, reported favorably the bill repealing the timber-culture laws. It was ordered to be placed on the calendar. Congress should pull down her Vest!

The Northern Tier is dead again, having bravely struggled against the inevitable for so long. As it seems to have as many lives as a cat we know not how soon we may be called upon to set this item again.

A singular accident occurred this week resulting in the loss of a fine heifer belonging to Dept. Sheriff Hopkins. The animal had broken its rope and wandered too close to the heels of a horse in an adjoining stall. When found the heifer had its skull crushed in and the mark of a horse-shoe too plainly told the story of its untimely end.

As will be seen by reference to the new ad of the New York store, elsewhere in our columns, that institution changes hands this week. Mr. Schmidt, who has conducted the store so successfully, making many friends, will leave this city for his old home in Racine, in about a week. We unite with his many friends in best wishes for his future welfare and prosperity.

H. G. Proud, of Winnipeg and Geo. McDonald, of St. Paul, both gentlemen of long experience in the mercantile business have purchased the stock and good will of the late firm of Fixen, Hansing & Co., and will carry on the business at the old New York Store We take great pleasure in introducing these gentlemen to the public and bespeak for them a liberal patronage.

It is now definitely understood that the Loan Exhibition of Arts and Antiquites, which has been postponed on account of the daily gospel services will be opened next Tuesday afternoon at the Congregational church. The management have labored diligently to secure such an exhibition as will be not only a credit to the projectors but a useful and enjoyable entertainment for all The amusements will be varied and something will be forthcoming for old and young of all nationalities. The four grand divisions of the earth join in supplying articles of all ages and descriptions, ancient and modern, for use and ornament, children will be instructed and delighted. Additional entertainment will be provided for each evening of which the public will be informed in due time. Admission to the exhibition only 15 cents. Special rates in the evening.

A Sad Affair.

On Thursday at about 6:30 a thrill of horror went through our little city at the report that "Charlie Davis had shot himself." Hastening to the store, on the corner of Main and Second Stre's a JOURNAL reporter found a scene of confusion which beggars description. The bleeding form of poor Charlie had just been carried up stairs, where his wife lay under the care of a physician. About an hour previous to the shooting affair Mrs. Davis accompanied by her brother-in-law, Mr. A. C. Cowing, entered Fortier's place where Charlie was playing a game of pool and going up to him Mrs. Davis entreated him to go home with her. She was laboring under great mental excitement at the time and did not appear to realize what she was about nor what she was doing. Charlie did not seem to grasp the situation readily and replied that he would finish the game first where-upon Mrs. D. became more wild and an unpleasant scene ensued lasting but a few minutes when Mrs. D. went out and returned home in a state of mind bordering on insanity; it is said that she begged for a revolver and then went into fearful spasms. Dr. Dampier was hastily summoned and while he was attending her, Charlie returned. After Mrs. Davis left the saloon the boys who had been playing with Charlie put up their cues and Charlie sat down in a chair and taking his face in his hands groaned and appeared to be in great mental agony. Going up to the bar he called for whiskey which the barkeeper refused him. He again asked for it saying "it is my last drink; my heart is broken and I shall never want another." The liquor was supplied and taking a big drink Charlie started for the door when the barkeeper said, "you have some chips due you." "Never mind them" said Charlie, "you may keep them, I shall never want any more chips." He went directly to the store, procured and loaded his revolver, when this was done no one was remaining in the store except Teddy McCormick, to whom Charlie said. "You take care of the store a few minutes, Teddy," and going behind the screen he placed the muzzle of the revolver to his right temple and fired falling instantly. McCormick rushed out in wild terror and summoned assistance which promptly arrived. Charlie lay in a stupor for several days but it is now said that the physicians have strong hopes of his ultimate recovery. It is said that for some time past Charlie, owing to financial troubles had been neglecting his business very much and spending his time at saloons which had so troubled his wife that she has been in a state of mind bordering on insanity during all this time. She does not remember anything that transpired immediately previous to the sad affair and neither she nor Charlie as yet knows that he fired the shot. She has been told that Charlie fell and hurt himself. The prospects are that Charlie may recover which his many friends earnestly hope and trust may be verified. We have given as near as we can find out the simple facts in the case leaving our readers to draw their own conclusions. It is a sad, sad case and shows that men can not be too careful how they use fire-water and fire-arms.

ELECTION NOTICE.

NOTICE is hereby given that an election will be held by the legal voters of Polk County, Minnesota, at the usual place of holding elections in the several voting precints of said county, on Tuesday, the 19th day of February, 1884, to vote on a proposition made by the Grand Forks, Crookston & Lake Superior Railroad company to said county for aid in the construction of a line of railroad through said county. The substance of the proposition to be voted on is that said Polk County shall issue its bonds for two hundred thousand dollars to run thirty years, but payable at the option of the county after twenty years from their date and drawing six per cent interest payable semi-annually, and both principal and interest payable at the Merchants National Exchange Bank in New York, and that said bonds shall be deposited in said bank in trust for said company, to be delivered when it shall have been completed ready for the running of cars upon its main line of railroad from the east bank of the Red River opposite the city of Grand Forks, in Dakota, through said county to the city of Crookston, to the head of Lake Superior, or to a point of connection with some other railroad constructed and in operation to the head of said lake, and also graded ready for the superstructure of a branch of said line from Crookston or some point west thereof to the east bank of the Red River at or near the South-west corner of said county. Provided said main line shall be so constructed and said branch so graded within three years from the date of such proposition; and provided further, that no interest shall be payable upon said bonds, the coupons for which shall have matured prior to such delivery.

The said county at its option to receive from said company an amount of shares of its capital stock equal at its par value to the amount of said bonds to be deposited at the same time with the same bank and to be delivered when said bonds are delivered. The voting upon such proposition will be by ballot, upon which shall be written or printed the words, "For the railroad proposition," or the words "Against the railroad proposition."

Such election to be conducted and the vote canvassed and returned as in case of a general election.

Dated this 2d day of February, 1884

Farming Notes.

Mrs. Hayes' poultry yard at Fremont is said to be the best in Ohio.

The abolition by the Patrons of Husbandry of "Grange No. 38," of Boston, with which the Commissioner of Agriculture was connected, is characterized by The Maine Farmer as "a triumph of principle."

Mr. Robert Burch, Fairport, N. Y., buys manure largely, we learn from The Midland Farmer; keeps three assistants; cultivates on the extensive system, and gets an average annual return of $5,400 from his twenty-seven acres, mostly devoted to cabbage and onions.

A correspondent of The American Stockman thinks very well indeed of the pretty jerseys but suspects that the elite are rather overdoing the boom to the injury of the breed, and suggests that the following course may become desirable. "If things go on in this direction, gathering volume as they go, it will be a question if it would not pay Jersey breeders who understand their business, to buy all the Jersey stock of the insurance men, dry goods merchants, doctors, lawyers and the kid glove gentry in general, and hire them to keep out of the business."

The country is suffering from a tremendous overstock of dog supply. Five per cent. of the canines in the United States could do all the business.

It is estimated that there are now in the United States 15,000,000 milch cows, and that there are made annually 1,300,000,000 pounds of butter and 450,000,000 pounds of cheese.

Attention of drivers is invited by The National Stockmen to a horse fact worth remembering, especially in spring: "Don't think your horse in best condition to endure a long trip or a hard drive because he has stood in stable for weeks and done nothing. If there is ever a time that he is 'soft' it is after a long idle spell, but many unthinking men do not realize this, and horses of standing and staying qualities are often injured by being brought too suddenly from idleness.

Dr. C. H. Fernald, State College, Oronto, Me., finds "a vast amount of amusement and instruction" in observation of insects. Here is an example, from Home Farm: "Under another jar I put a family of grasshoppers, and the amount of grass those gourmands ate was something marvellous. It was interesting, nevertheless, to see one of those six-legged savages stand up on four hind legs and hold a blade of grass in his two fore legs and chew away on it till it was all devoured."

Dr. F. M. Hexamer mentions two instances of this increasing danger which recently came under his personal observation. In one case, canned peaches, eaten by a strong, healthy boy, produced severe pain, vomiting and diarrhœa; in the other, canned beans poisoned an entire family, a nursing baby even being affected through its mother's milk. The symptoms were exactly those of poisoning from some zinc or copper salts, and serious results might have followed but for the timely assistance of a physician."

Mr. Adam Hood, Markam, Canada, has according to the Toronto Globe, practised for two years a successful plan for saving turnip plants: "The 'scout' turnip is first sown in drills, and then the white turnips are sown broadcast between. The latter comes up first and is relished best by the flies, and by the time the white turnip is eaten the 'scout, has become too tough to be relished by its insect enemy, and so escapes with comparatively little injury."

Mr. Joseph Harris decribes his economical culture of carrots, by which he raised a satisfactory crop with no more outlay of labor than is required for potatoes; "the plants came up thick from seeds sowed in rows twenty-one inches apart; the cultivator was running within an inch of the plants, which kept down the weeds, and the carrots grew with astonishing rapidity. But they must be thinned, or the crop would be worthless, so the men went through the patch with hoes and cut spaces clear across, the width of the hoe, leaving bunches of four or ten young carrots. The cultivator was kept going, and after harvest the weeds which escaped were cut out by hand The roots were diverse in size, but the whole crop was larger than where regularly thinned."

Cold Weather Hints.

From Good Cheer.

A folded newspaper, covering the chest and shoulders under a cloak or coat, will be found very comfortable in extreme cold weather, especially while riding.

A noiseless way of feeding a coal fire is to put a shovelful of coal in a paper bag; prepare a half-dozen bags at a time; use one or more as needed, and thus the noise and dust generally accompanying the usual mode of replenishing a fire will be avoided.

When about to take a long sleighride, make ready a piece of joist (of any kind of hard wood such as house builders use) the length of the sleigh-seat and twice the thickness of common brick; heat it on the stove or in the oven. It is surprising how very hot such a piece of wood will become without burning, and how very long it will retain heat. On such a seat, and covered with a buffalo robe, I have known people to ride seventy miles, comfortably, and the wood to be quite warm at the journey's end. A similar piece for the feet, at the same time nicely tucked in from the wind, was delightful.

Another foot-warmer, more easily made ready and serving many purposes, is a bag of bed-ticking, fourteen inches square. Bind the seams with braid or a strip of ticking, leaving a small opening until filled with sand. Make a slip-cover for it, of any material you choose, or crochet of some bright color, and fasten with buttons and loops.

When needed, heat very hot in the oven, put in its case, and it is ready for use.

Hints for Home.

DECORATED WOOD BOXES.—Hickory wood is the fashionable fuel just now, and wood-boxes are handsomely decorated. Some are covered with plush in a shade to match the furnishing of the room and have dainty designs hand-painted upon them. Others are made of stamped leather in octagon shape, and have tassels made of worsted ornamenting the ends. Those made of bamboo are more sensible and less extravagant than any of the others, and they look almost as decorative. They are adorned simply by a piece of pale blue or scarlet ribbon.

Some hostesses now serve hot coffee at afternoon "at homes" instead of hot tea. This is an innovation to be devoutly thankful for. Any kind of coffee is preferable to the weak, cold, unpalatable tea sometimes served. Everybody has not the faculty for making good coffee. It should be ground just before using. The coffee pot should be thoroughly scalded, the coffee then put in an egg, yelk, shells and all, should be mixed with it, and boiling water immediately poured upon it. The coffee should boil five minutes, and then should be taken from the stove and settled. Many prefer boiling the milk with the coffee, but this is not as a general thing a good plan, for somtimes all of the guests do not like milk in their coffee.

English Cookery.

In England very little benefit is extracted from the present long list of vegetables substances. Bread and potatoes, cabbage, and in agricultural districts beans with a little bacon and cheese, and milk for the children, almost exhaust the list of food attainable by the working village population. What is called butchers' meat rarely makes its appearance in the cottage of an agricultural laborer, but it is quite certain that if the humble and wholesome materials at his disposition were more skillfully treated, he would be greatly the better. In manufacturing towns vast quantities of food are destroyed rather than consumed, owing to the ignorance of the women of the most elementary principles of cooking. A hastily-made fire and a frying pan, a lump of butter of indefinite size, some bacon a few eggs of doubtful freshness compose the culinary preparations of a family earning between £2 and £3 per week.—London News.

The Arab and His Horse.

The Arabians never beat their horses: they never cut their tails; they treat them gently; they speak to them and seem to hold a discourse; they use them as friends: they never attempt to increase their speed by the whip, or spur them, but in cases of great necessity. They never fix them to a stake in the fields, but suffer them to pasture at large around their habitations; and they come running the moment they hear their masters voice. In consequence of such treatment these animals become docile and tractable in the highest degree. They resort at night to their tents, and lie down in the midst of the children, without ever hurting them in the slightest manner. The little boys and girls are often seen upon the body or neck of the mare, while the beasts continue inoffensive and harmless, permitting them to play without injury.—From "The Arab and his Horse."

Care for Small Concerns.

Care for extremely small concerns of the household marks the difference between the truly excellent housekeeper and the poor one; and while I have no patience with those people who hold the opinion that the prosperity of the family depends exclusively upon the wife's economy, still there is a side of truth in it, and all women would do well to consider it. A good many pence if not pounds are saved in the course of a year if the clothesline is brought in and and kept dry, instead of being allowed to remain out in all kinds of weather. If you have a strip of board, with a notch in each end, to wind the rope on, it will be a convenience. Another careful practice is to have a basket or bag to keep the clothes in, and a place for the basket or bag. Still another is to see that the wall paper is not spoiled by water being allowed to spatter on it. The light colored oilcloth made to cover washstands is useful, also, to tack up back of the sink and behind the water-tank on the range.

A New Requirement in Modern Farming.

From the American Agriculturist.

A good farmer always needed skill, but in the changed conditions of modern farming a different kind of skill is needed from that required by our fathers and grandfathers. This is more largely the case West than East, but true in both. Formerly it was mostly manual skill in the use of simple implements, such as the sickle, the scythe and the common walking plow. Now the farmer needs to know how to adjust, run and care for machinery. Machines properly handled call for little manual expertness to run them. But to manage the present implements requires a degree of mechanical skill that a large proportion of our farmers do not possess. To comprehend the full extent of this change compare the modern threshing-machine with the old-fashioned flail, or the self-binding harvester with the old sickle, or its successor, the grain cradle. Every careful observer must recognize the fact that the lack of skill in using and caring for his machinery is one of the most potent sources of loss to the farmer.

We have known one man to use a mower for ten years without expending over $30 in repairs—or $3 annually—while his neighbor, in cutting a smaller quantity of grass used up three equally good machines in the same time. Compare the expenses of this one item: First farmer expended $130, plus, say $70 for interest, or $200 in all, for ten years. This is just $50 per annum—quite an item, you will say, for mowing tools alone, but still much cheaper than mowing with the sythe. The other wore out three machines—$300, to which add repairs, say same as the other, $30, and interest on $100 for ten years, $70; on $100 (the second machine, for six years), $42; and on another $100 (the third machine, for three years), $21, and you have a grand total of $463—or $46.30 per annum—an annual expense of more than twice as much as the other. The same calculations concerning the harvester, the sulky plow, the hay rake, and other farm implements, make an enormous difference in the cost to the man who is unskillful in using and caring for them. An important inquiry is, how the present difficulty can be remedied.

Senator Wilson's Little Romance.

Washington Correspondence New York Sun.

The election of Judge Wilson as Senator from Maryland is well regarded here. He was an inveterate snuff taker many years after the practice had been tabooed in good society, but finally compromised by giving up his snuff-box and making an arrangement with a deserving woman, who kept a shop in Snow Hill, to get a pinch whenever he called at the store for it. Mrs. Knox, who had been in better circumstances before she kept the shop, had a pretty and refined daughter, who had been educated, and was a lady in manner and deportment. The mother died. Thinking Judge Wilson a staid old widower, and adapted to looking after a pretty and friendless girl, she had left her property in the judge's hands, asking him to look after it, and to be mindful of her daughter, an orphan.

The judge settled up the estate, secured her little patrimony to the daughter, and finally succumbed to her beauty and merit, and married her. The match turned out most happily.

RACING IN THE ANTIPODES.

Scenes Around the Melbourne Grand Stand.

By noon the hill above the grand stand was thickly covered with a picturesque forest of humanity; it looked still in the distance, but was as unresting as a bee-hive when approached. This was the democratic place—admission two shillings—and it was decidedly the best point from which to see the course. It is an artificial hill built by the committee (they could afford it on their receipts of £50,000 a year), and there was plenty of room on it, even when occupied by some 200,000 people. The babies could freely roll down its turfy sides while their mammas were lost in admiration of the costumes on the lawn below, where they intend those babies shall promenade with the best when they grow up. The scene from this hill was wonderful. Beyond the high priced lawn and inclosure was the great "flat," on which an ever-moving multitude stretched away into the distance until they looked like industrious ants. But when the bell sounded they massed themselves in a twinkling along the course and became an organic whole—a long curving anaconda. When a race was over the momentarily motoinless monster broke up again into bits and was soon distributed over the plain.

What can I say of the grand stand? Probably 30,000 people were there or hereabout, mostly in costliest costumes—some of these imported for the occasion at a cost of from £100 to £500. The wonder of it! Credulous travelers sometimes tell us of Hindoo jugglers who conjure from the floor a bush which clothes itself with blossoms while the spectator is gazing, and it seems as if some magic had evoked this vast Victoria Regia, whose petals were brilliantly arrayed ladies. The dresses were finer in general effect than in detail. But criticism was disarmed when one saw the happy, beaming and generally intelligent faces of those so finely decorated. It was pleasant to see so many people, evidently of humble origin, who had grown rich enough to indulge their tastes in a matter of so much moral importance as dress. There is something to be said for that remark of a Frenchwoman, that "the consciousness of being perfectly dressed affords a satisfaction not to be obtained from the consolations of religion." That sort of satisfaction was visible in every feminine face on the grand stand and its lawn, and what is anybody else's preference compared with theirs? The whole race-course, its environment and arrangements, can only be described as a work of art. Their completeness is due chiefly to the secretary of the Victoria Racing Club, who tells me he knows nothing whatever about horses or racing. If this gentleman could only succeed in reducing or regulating (if it is incurable) the betting mania, he ought to go to England and teach them there how to make a race an enjoyable holiday. Epsom knows nothing of these careful preparations of tables for luncheons, or of the regiment of boys that remove all bottles and rubbish from the sward in large baskets.

I had nearly forgotten to say that there was some racing yesterday, too. Several times I managed to turn from the human attractions and observed small islets of variegated caps and sashes floating around the pear-shaped course, dark streaks of steeds beneath them, foam of dust in their wake. Each horse and rider were fixed in one Centaur form, and it was not without beauty. But even the strained sinews were less pleasing than the continuous murmur that accompanied the muffled drum-beat of the hoofs, rising through all the scale—the single voice of the hundred thousand—to break at last in a wild cheer to the victor. In that cheer I joined inwardly, but it was with elation at beholding such a vast concourse of human beings, with shining faces and glad voice, forming together a magnificent picture of human health, wealth and happiness framed in the scenery of a fresh and prosperous land.—M. D. Conway in San Francisco Chronicle.

The Causes of Deteriorated Eyesight.

The causes to which this deterioration of eyesight has been attributed are alleged to be cross-lights from opposite windows, light shining directly on the face, insufficient light, small types, and to the position of the desk, forcing the scholar to bend over and bring the eyes too close to the book or writing paper, etc.

But were all these defects remedied, the integrity of the eye would not be restored nor its deterioration prevented. The chief causes of the evil would still remain. These are the colors of the paper and ink. White paper and black ink are ruining the eyesight of all reading nations. The "rays of the sun," says Lord Bacon, "are reflected by a white body, and are absorbed by a black one." No one dissents from this opinion; but, despite these indications of Nature and of philosophy, we print our books and write our letters in direct opposition to the suggestions of optical science.

When we read a book printed in the existing mode we do not see the letters, which, being black or non-reflective. The shapes teach the retina, but they are not received by a spontaneous, direct action of that organ. The white surface of the paper is reflected, but the letters are detected only by a discriminative effort of the optic nerves. This effort annoys the nerves, and, when long continued, exhausts their susceptibility. The human eye cannot long sustain the broad glare of a white surface without injury. The author of "Spanish Vistas," in Harper's Magazine, says of Cartagena that "blind people seem to be numerous there, a fact which may be owing to the excessive dazzle of the sunlight and the absence of verdure." Mr. Seward, in his tour around the world, observed that "in Egypt opthalmia is universal," attributing it to the same "excessive dazzle" of the wide areas of white sand; and the British soldiers, in the state campaign in that country, exhibited symptoms of the disease. In the Smithsonian report for 1877 it is stated, in a paper on "Color Blindness," that "M. Chevreul has produced 14,420 distinguishable tints of the elementary colors, from which the paper manufacturers could select colors more agreeable to the eye than the dazzling white, so weakening and lacerating to the nerves of that delicate organ."[Samuel Yorke at Lee, in Popular Science Monthly.

There was a time in this country when it could be said that honest labor of any kind was not only respectable in fact, but was regarded and treated as such by people of every social grade. Forty years ago the farmers' daughters in New England went out as hired "help" in their neighbors' families without a thought of degradation, and the same custom prevailed almost every-where in the rural portions of the northern states. Yankee girls who were ambitious to make higher wages than they could get in the kitchen went to the factories at Lowell and other places, and many a mortgage on a homestead among the hills was paid off by the aid of the daughter who worked in the mill.

RELIGION AND LOVE.

A Romance of the Belleville Convent Hororer.

St. Louis Republican.

Among those who escaped from the burning Immaculate Conception convent at Belleville, last Saturday night, was a very pretty young lady, an orphan from one of the interior villages of Illinois, who is now lying in one of the wards of the St. Elizabeth hospital, Belleville, recovering from injuries she sustained in jumping from the third-story window. Although in moderate circumstances, her beauty and amiable disposition have won for her many ardent admirers and among them several wealthy young men, who have sued for her hand. All of those lovers with the exception of one, the son of one of the wealthiest merchants in East St. Louis, were unsuccessful in their suits, and even he, in pressing his claims, encountered obstacles which for a time threatened to prevent him from leading her to the altar. While she was visiting the friends of the young man in question, he met her and fell madly in love with her, and she reciprocated. He was about to propose marriage, when his father, learning she was a Protestant, objected to the match, saying that any son of his who married any other than a Catholic girl, would be disinherited. The unhappy lover called on the young lady and laid all the facts before her. She said that she had no objections to becoming a Catholic. One branch of the Christian church was about as good as the other, anyway, she thought. The lover was happy again It was decidedd that she should enter the Catholic convent at Belleville. When she informed her guardian that she had determined to change her fault and spend the remainder of the year in the Immaculate Conception convent, that individual, who happened to be an uncompromising Protestant, refused to furnish the money necessary for her expenses while at the institution. She informed her lover of her predicament whereupon he volunteered to pay her tuition. She objected to this arrangement at first, but was finally prevailed upon to allow the young man to foot her bills with the understanding that she would become his wife immediately after she had graduated. She accordingly entered the convent about three months ago and remained there up to the time of last Saturday night's fire. After she had jumped from the third story of the burning building a young man picked her up and carried her to his home in Belleville, where he watched over her and did all he could to restore her to consciousness. She was subsequently removed to the hospital, where the young man has since called on her frequently. It is said that he has fallen desperately in love with her.

The young lady wears upon one of her fingers an engagement ring, placed there by her East St. Louis lover, but her latest victim entertains hopes of being able to gain her hand. She still remains faithful to the young man who placed her in the convent, however, and for that reason as soon as she recovers from her injuries a wedding in high life is likely to take place in East St. Louis. The friends of her rescuer extend to him their sympathy.

There was a rumor in New York last week that Jay Gould was financially embarassed, and a friend hurried to Gould's office to learn the truth of the story. Gould took him to a vault in the mercantile deposit company and showed him one package of Western Union stock to the amount of $27,000,000; certificates of $10,000,000 of Missouri Pacific stock, and other large packages of good interest paying securities. These, together with vast sums on all of the banks, showed that Gould was not in a bad financial strait, and is not likely to come to poverty just yet. Gould proposes to prosecute those who circulated reports that he was financially embarbarrassed. He has remained silent about many scandalous charges but the last was too much. It upset his equanimity.

A steamer is to be built at Buffalo during the coming spring and summer, which, it is expected, will do much toward restoring passenger travel on the great lakes to the proud position it held before the day of railroads. The new vessel is to be about three hundred feet in length, built of steel, and designed to attain a speed of eighteen miles an hour, making it possible to cover the distance between Buffalo and Duluth in about three days. As the route between these two cities is as short by water as by land, such a vessel will have little to fear from railroad competition during fine weather, and will no doubt do much to give the lakes the popularity among tourists which such magnificent bodies of water deserve.

Dr. Thomas' Eclectric Oil won't cure hams but it will cure colds and coughs; if it doesn't the druggist will refund to the purchaser cheerfully.

A piece of stout rope looped at one end will cure horse thieves and bank thieves of their evil ways. Dr. Thomas' Eclectric Oil is an equally efficacious agent in the curing of bruises, burns, bites, scalds, cuts and wounds of any sort. Try it and see.

Dr. Thomas' Eclectric Oil "makes pain hum." That is what Thos. G. Read of 38 East Swan street, Buffalo, N. Y., says. He suffered from Rheumatism several years, when the malady yielded to Eclectric Oil like frost in a June sun.

Edward S. Rowley, 222 Twelfth street, Davenport, Iowa, says that "as a remedy for Catarrh Dr. Thomas' Eclectric Oil stands at the top." Mr. Rowley didn't distort the truth a particle.

The editor of the St. Thomas Times (D. T.) says he would not do without Dr. Thomas' Eclectric Oil; Mrs. M. F. Fellows, Burr Oak, Mich., praises it highly for colds; E L. Meader, Delaware, Iowa, calls it the best thing in the world for asthmatic bronchitis.

ALLEN'S Lung Balsam! A GOOD FAMILY REMEDY! —THAT WILL CURE— Coughs, Colds, Croup, CONSUMPTION

Dr. Meredith, Dentist, of Cincin'ti, was thought to be in the last stages of Consumption, and was induced by his friends to try Allen's Lung Balsam after the formula was shown him. We have his letter that it at once cured his cough and that he was able to resume his practice.

Jeremiah Wright, of Marion County, W. Va., writes us that his wife had Pulmonary Consumption and was pronounced incurable by their physician, when the use of Allen's Lung Balsam entirely cured her. He writes that he and his neighbors think it the best medicine in the world.

CONSUMPTION.

Wm. C. Digges, Merchant, of Bowling Green, Va., writes April 4, 1881, that he wants us to know that the Lung Balsam has cured his mother of Consumption, after the physician had given her up as incurable. He says others knowing her case have taken the Balsam and been cured. He thinks all so afflicted should give it a trial.

Wm. A. Graham & Co., Wholesale Druggists Zanesville, Ohio, write us of the cure of Matthias Freeman, a well-known citizen, who had been afflicted with Bronchitis in its worst form for twelve years. The Lung Balsam cured him as it has cured many others of Bronchitis.

Allen's Lung Balsam

POTASH!

Iodide of Potassium is one of the strongest of the minerals used in medicine, and has produced much suffering in the world. Taken for a long time and in large doses, it dries up the gastric juices, impairs digestion, the stomach refuses food, and the patient declines in health and weight. Persons with Blood or Skin Diseases should be careful how they take these mineral poisons, as in most instances the effect of them is to almost permanently impair the constitution. To take the place of these poisons we offer you a safe, sure, prompt and permanent relief from your troubles. Swift's Specific is entirely a vegetable preperation, and it is easy to convince you of its merit.

I have cured permanently Blood Taint in the third generation by the use of Swift's Specific, after I had most signally failed with Mercury and Potash.

SAMARITAN NEVER FAILS. NERVINE

"You claim too much for SAMARITAN NERVINE," says a skeptic. "How can one medicine be a specific for Epilepsy, Dyspepsia, Alcoholism, Opium Eating, Rheumatism, Spermatorrhœa, or Seminal Weakness, and fifty other complaints?" We claim it a specific, simply, because the virus of all diseases arises from the blood. Its Nervine, Resolvent, Alterative and Laxative properties meet all the conditions herein referred to. It's known world wide as

THE GREAT NERVE CONQUEROR

It quiets and composes the patient—not by the introduction of opiates and drastic cathartics, but by the restoration of activity to the stomach and nervous system, whereby the brain is relieved of morbid fancies, which are created by the causes above referred to.

To Clergymen, Lawyers, Literary men, Merchants, Bankers, Ladies and all those whose sedentary employment causes nervous prostration, irregularities of the blood, stomach, bowels or kidneys or who require a nerve tonic, appetizer or stimulant, SAMARITAN NERVINE is invaluable. Thousands proclaim it the most wonderful invigorant that ever sustained the sinking system. $1.50. Sold by all Druggists. (14)

THE LAWYER'S SECRET.

It was in a luxuriously furbished room where a glowing grate threw genial light and warmth upon the occupants that General Langton, lawyer and millionaire, listening with bated breath and pallid cheeks to a low and melodious voice that told the story of life.

The speaker, a beautiful woman of about thirty, yet ten years younger than Mr. Langton, reclined in a low cushioned chair, her attitude both speaking of the ease wealth gives, but her face was full of the deepest anguish as her lips recounted the story.

"You love me," she said gently, yet sadly, "and I love you as I never loved any one before, although I am a widow. That you know, but did not know my husband's name. By my uncle's last request I dropped it and took his with the property he had left me. Do not look at me tenderly, Gerald, do not shake my voice or my heart, for when you know who I am you will not repeat the offer you made me, and which heaven is my witness I tried to divert."

"Let your consience be at rest there," said her listener, in a grave, yet tender voice; "you have never given me one hope, Maude. By what instinct I knew that you loved me I can never tell. Something in your eyes—some tone of your voice betrayed you. If, as you say, something in your past life does separate us, you have been no coquette to torment me with false hopes. But, Maude, tell me again, whatever stands between us, you love me?"

"I love you," she said gravely, "and it is because I love you that I will not let you link your honorable name with that of the wretch who was my husband. I was very young—not sixteen—when he came to make a visit to some friends living at Grassbank. Uncle Richard has a country seat near the village. I first met Alexander at a picnic, where he was the very life of the party; everybody's cavalier; courteous to all; full of wit and animation and service to all. I believe every girl on the grounds thought she had captivated him, his attentions were so well divided and yet so impressive to each one. He claimed to be no more than a salesman in a large wholesale house with a good salary, but he had the manners of a gentleman of education, and the most perfect beauty of face and form that I ever saw in a man. It was not long before it was evident that he wished to win my love, and he had an easy task. Such love as a child of sixteen can give I gave him. He was the impersonation of every hero of poetry and fiction with whom my limited reading had made me familiar. School-girl like I had made an ideal hero, and fitted this, my first admirer, with all his imaginary perfections.

"From the first, Uncle Richard disliked him, pronouncing him false and shallow, and assuring me that my personal attractions had not won his heart; but the fact of my being an heiress to a large property had gained me the protestations in which I so firmly believed.

"It is a painful story to me now, Gerald. Let it suffice that I have lived in a world of pleasant dreams while Alexander remained at Grassbank. When he left me he carried my promise to be his wife at Christmas.

"I think if my money had depended on Uncle Richard, my marriage might have been prevented by his threatening to disinheirt me, but both from my father and mother I had inherited money that made me independent in a pecuniary sense of his control or consent.

"Most grudgingly, however, uncle did consent, after searching inquiry about Alexander, resulting in no worse report than that his employers thought him fast, idle, and just the man to be a fortune hunter. Even then my dear uncle would have protected my fortune by settling it upon myself; but with the reckless generosity of extreme youth I refused to have this done. Never, I was firmly convinced would my adored Alexander wrong me in any way.

"For a year after the splendid wedding that made me Alexander's wife I was very happy. I was too ignorant of value to understand that we were living far beyond our income—enjoyed to the utmost the luxuries around me—the constant gayety that was in such strong contrast to the school routine from which I had been released.

"Then began a life of neglect, often of quarreling, when I objected to my husband's course of conduct—his drinking, his extravagance and his late hours. Still I found my own pleasures in society.

"It was four years after my marriage, when I was thunderstruck by Alexander asking me to request a loan of money from Uncle Richard, with the information added that every penny of my property was gone.

"Since then I have known that a large portion of it was lost at the gaming table.

"Long before this I had lost all love for my husband. Respect had died out when I knew the dissipated life he was leading, and foolish as I was I could not continue to love a man whom I despised. I refused the errand and brought down a torrent of such great abuse that I really expected that Alexander would end by striking me.

"Day after day the request was renewed, but I would not yield. Upon my marriage, Uncle Richard had sold the city residence and taken a permanent abode at Grassbank, where, knowing my husband to be an unwelcome guest, I never visited him. I wrote occasionally, but the love of years, like that of a father and child, had been so sadly strained by my persistence in marrying Alexander that even our correspondence was languid and commonplace.

"I would not, therefore, write to him to ask a favor that I knew would not have been necessary without criminal recklessness of expenditure, and such refusals made my husband more furious. Then came an overwhelming blow. Alexander forged a check and drew £2,000 of Uncle Richard's money from the bank. I don't think my uncle would have prosecuted him had he guessed who was the forger; but he handed the whole matter over to the law as soon as it was discovered that the check was forged. It was then traced to Alexander, and at the same time it was found that he had robbed in the same way his former employers. He had given up all work on his marriage; but when found himself without money his knowledge of the business enabled him to forge the name of Derkiss & Co. Even if Uncle Richard had spared him for my sake the other forgery would have entitled him to penal servitude. He was sentenced to seven years, and uncle took me home full of heavenly pity and forgiveness for the child who had treated him so ungratefully."

"Then your husband is in prison?" said Gerald, in a hard, strained voice.

"No, no, he is dead! He died within the first year. Uncle Richard saw the death in a paper, and sent the money for the burial. No, I am free; but, none the less, I am the widow of a convicted felon."

"But, none the less," quoted Gerald, "the woman I love and honor above all others, and hope still to make my wife."

It took, however, more than one interview, full of love's pleading, to win Maude from her resolution. She so honored her lover, and was so proud of his good name and the position he had attained by his talent, that her sensitive nature shrunk from even the shadow of her misery upon his life.

But the victory was won at last, and the lawyer walked home one evening full of a proud glad joy, for Maud had then promised to be his wife.

"If you are willing to take Alexander Hull's widow to be your wife," she said, "I will not oppose you any longer, for I love you with all my heart."

He had no thought but of that glad triumph when he turned up the gas in his office. He was in the habit of making a late visit there before going up to his bedroom, in case notes or messages were left for him. One lay there on this evening, a shabby looking envelope, but directed in a bold, handsome hand which he recognized at once.

He tore it open. After a few words of introduction, the note ran:

"You did the best you could on my trial, but the facts were too strong for you. I have now a last favor to ask of you. I die, as you know, at noon to-morrow. You, as my lawyer, can see me at any time. Will you come as soon as you receive this, and with the gratitude of the man you know as JAMES FOX."

"The man I know as James Fox," muttered the lawyer; "the smooth, plausible scoundrel who actually made me believe him innocent of the hideous murder for which he was convicted. I can find extenuation for some murders, but this cold-blooded assassination of an old man for money only was revolting. How he deceived me, though, for a time. And how he exulted in doing so when he saw facts were too strong. Shall I go to him? I suppose I must. It is still very early."

It was not yet midnight when Gerald Langton was ushered into the cell of the man who, in a few short hours, was to meet the extreme penalty of the law for the worst of all crimes. Yet there was nothing revolting in the appearance of the criminal. His dress was neat, his hair carefully arranged, his moustache faultless, his hands white and refined looking. He rose from his seat upon the bed as his lawyer entered the cell.

"I knew you would come," he said, courteously, "though you were offended at my want of frankness. Well, that is all over. You will not refuse the last request of a dying man, Mr. Langton?"

"Not if I can grant it," was the reply.

"This," said the murderer, "is not my first offense against the law. Some years ago I was sentenced to a term of years for forgery. By a strange accident I escaped the penalty. On the same day James Fox was sentenced to two years for petty larceny, and we were sent together to prison. James Fox—my companion, understand, not myself—was deranged, but his lawyers had not been able to save him, as his aberration was not always apparent. When we were entered upon the books of the prison, imagine my amazement when my fellow prisoner gave my name for his own. Like a flash I saw the advantage to be gained by the deception, and allowed the error to pass. My companion committed suicide, and I escaped with two years' imprisonment instead of seven. But I feared recognition and went to Canada. There I lived by my wits until a year ago, when I returned to try and raise money from my wife, and thought I saw an easier plan by committing the crime for which I die to-morrow. But I want to see my wife. I wronged her—I robbed her—but heaven is my witness, I love her. When I was in prison she dropped my name and took her own again. So it it not for Mrs. Alexander Hull you must ask, but for Mrs. Maude Temple."

Was the room reeling—the ceiling falling—the wall closing around him? Gerald Langton felt they were, as the name fell upon his ears. Maude—his Maude—the wife of this cool villain who talked of his hideous crimes as if they were ordinary events? Well, he knew that to carry the man's message was to seperate him from Maude forever. Never would she let him marry the widow of a murderer! Very rapidly all the terrible facts passed one after the other, and he said: "If you love her why add a misery to her life? She may have lived down the old pain you have caused her; why for, a selfish gratification, will you make her whole life a misery?"

"She is my wife! I would bid her farewell."

"She is not your wife. Your own crimes have released her from any allegiance to you.

"You know her?"

"Yes! I know what she has suffered, and beg of you to let her still believe you died years ago."

"She is happy!"

"Scarcely that. Such wounds as hers never heal entirely, but it is cruelty to tear them open when they are quiet."

"Has she married?"

"No! She is your widow."

"It is hard to deny myself one more sight of her face and the hope I had that she would say she forgave me."

"Think of her, not yourself."

There was a long silence in the cell.

Every throb of Gerald Layton's heart was pain to him, but Alexander Hull sat in moody silence; evidently reluctant to give up his wish.

At last he spoke.

"You have been very good to me. Tell me, now, if you have any personal reason for your request. Perhaps you may love her."

"I do!" was the reply. "She has promised to be my wife."

"Then it will be James Fox who is hanged to-morrow! I meant to give my real name, but I will carry my secret to the grave. It may be in another world that the little last self-denial will be a plea for me. Go now. You may trust me."

He kept his word, and Gerald Langton his secret.

When Maude, a few weeks later, became his wife, she little guessed the terrible ordeal which he had spared her, or the added disgrace that belonged to the name she had given up.—Exchange.

The Real American Bird.

From the New York Herald.

When plans for our national insignia were under discussion, Dr. Franklin advocated elevating the American turkey to the dignity which was finally assigned to the American eagle. In intermediate generations there have been those who thought that the honor should be transferred to the American oyster or to the canvasback duck. If we were to consult foreign opinion at the present day, as indicated in our special cable dispatches to-day from Paris and Berlin, Frenchmen and Germans would confer it upon the American hog. He is noble emblem, according to the Clarion and to the French Academy of Medicine and to Professor Virchow, of cheap and wholesome food for the toiling millions of unhappy Europe. And they are right.

Kate Field at Salt Lake.

Miss Kate Field repeated her lecture on "Evenings with Dickens" in Salt Lake City for the benefit of the Mormon Hospital. She spoke in "Social Hall," a Mormon building, dedicated by Brigham Young, and is probably the first Gentile who ever stood on its platform. Her audience were almost exclusively Mormon, attentive, but unresponsive. Just before the lecture began Governor Murray entered, and his entrance created considerable remark, the lines are so strongly drawn there between "Saint" and "Gentile." When questioned as to why he came, Governor Murray replied: "I wanted to show my respect for Miss Field, and I thought wherever she could afford to go, I could. Moreover, I wish to support everything in Utah that is compatible with loyalty to the Government."

Agassiz Upon Life and Death.

From the Philadelphia Ledger.

An esteemed correspondent of the Public Ledger favors us with the following impressive extract from Professor Agassiz to a friend. "Professor Meek, who has been an inmate of the Smithsonian building for nearly twenty years, was seized with violent hemorrhage of the lungs, from which he did not recover. I urged him to make a will, but he said it was not necessary at present as he would soon be well again; in this, however, he was mistaken. He was a remarkable man, with general powers of mind; he devoted himself for nearly thirty-five years exclusively to one study, that of the shells found in the geological formation of this country, as compared with the living shells in different parts of the world. In this study he established a wide reputation, since his labors are highly prized as determining the relative ages of the various geological formations of this country.

"His sickness and his death have deeply impressed me with the instability and uncertainty of all worldly objects, as well as with the wonderful phenomena of life and death. Although these are constantly occurring around us and must be exhibited in our own case sooner or later, yet they are never fully realized in all their magnitude. How momentous the change! Now a living, intelligent being, and in a minute, perhaps, a mere mass of inert matter. We awake to consciousness and find ourselves in a world of ever changing scenes, which we call knowledge, amuse ourselves with fleeting shadows, and then sink again into unconsciousness, to awake hereafter—but when? or where? or what?

"This is the great subject which apparently should absorb all our attention, and render everything else of no account; yet it is, perhaps, a wise dispensation that we cannot, realize its magnitude, and are left free to discharge the duties of life. We are parts of an immense system; a mighty maze, but not without a plan and purpose, there is a sufficient reason for our existence, could we find it, and since we are endowed with the idea of good and evil, of love of justice and benevolence, we may, in consideration of these, conclude it our duty, short as our lives may be, to endeavor to improve ourselves and our fellow men, and leave the world wiser and better for our having lived. By so doing we shall best advance our own happiness, and the well being of our race.

Alcohol, and the Heart-Beats.

As a rule it will do well to let the process of life in our bodies go on without noticing it, for doubtless it would make us very nervous to have the internal machinery in motion before our eyes. But to prevent people from abusing that delicate machinery, it often becomes necessary to show it; and if a person addicted to wrong indulgence is made "nervous" by the sight, it may save him from being something far worse.

Dr. N. B. Richardson, of London, the noted physician, says he was recently able to convey a considerable amount of conviction to an intelligent scholar by a simple experiment. The scholar was singing the praises of the "Ruddy Bumper," and saying, he could not get through the day, without it, when Dr. Richardson said to him,—

"Will you be good enough to feel my pulse as I stand here?"

He did so. I said, "Count it carefully; what does it say?"

"Your pulse says seventy-four."

I then sat down in a chair and asked him to count it again. He did so, and said, "Your pulse has gone down to seventy."

I then lay down on the lounge, and said,—

"Will you take it again?"

"He replied, "Why, its only sixty-four; what an extraordinary thing!"

I then said, "When you lie down at night, that is the way nature gives your your heart rest. You know nothing about it, but that beating organ is resting to that extent, and when you reckon it up, it is a great deal of rest, because in lying down the heart is doing ten strokes less a minute. Multiply that by sixty and it is six hundred; multiply it by eight hours, and within a fraction it is five thousand strokes different; and as the heart is throwing six ounces of blood at every stroke, it makes a difference of thirty thousand ounces of lifting during the night.

"When I lie down at night without any alcohol, that is the rest my heart gets. But when you take your wine or grog you do not allow that rest, for the influence of alcohol is to increase the number of strokes, and instead of getting this rest you put on something like fifteen thousand extra strokes, and the result is you rise up very seedy and unfit for the next day's work till you have taken a little more of the ruddy bumper which you say is the soul of a man below."

Eloped With His Father's Bride.

John W. Hines, the cashier of a Great Barrington bank, arrived at Pittsfield, Mass. He was accompanied by a little lady whom he registered as his wife at a hotel. Hines is a good-looking young fellow of 25. It appears that young Hines' father recently married again. Last week he returned from North Egremont with his young bride, who is connected with one of the best known families in the country. She is an heiress of a large fortune. Last fall she met the elder Hines at a husking bee and fell in love with him. He escorted her home that night, paid her frequent visits, and in three weeks the wedding took place. Shortly after Mrs. Hines was introduced to her step-son. He was smitten with her pretty face and figure and told her so. He told Mrs. Hines that his father was over 60 years old and concealed his grey hair and whiskers by a liberal use of dye. Hines assured her that the story was true and urged her to leave with him. With $2,000 they fled, buying a small farm in Sheffield, and they started off for the depot. A farmer's boy with a load of straw soon overtook them and invited them to ride. They accepted, climbing up and concealing themselves under the bundles of straw. They reached the depot just as the milk train was going out and got aboard. The young man's father arrived in the afternoon, but the young couple had fled. They are said to have gone to Forth Adams.

Eight professors and all the students in the St. Louis College of Physicians have withdrawn from that institution. Politics has had a good deal to do with its management, and the salaries had not been paid.

During the recent arrest of vagrants in Paris, nearly twenty men over ninety years of age were arraigned. Several of those taken had [illegible] except when in jail, for thirty years.

Too Late.

To all who have ever felt remorse, the mere thought of it should be caution enough against breaking the laws of duty and right conduct. But thousands who are uninfluenced by higher moral restraints rush into wrong doing without thinking of the self-reproach and punishment that are sure to come. The following contains a lesson to hot-headed youth who are in danger of breaking their mothers' hearts by disobedience or hasty, unfilial words:

They were sitting in the waiting-room of a depot together—the dapper little man who looked as though he might be a commercial traveller, and the great rough fellow whose cowhide boots, shaggy garments and broad, brown Mexican hat told that he was fresh from some semi-civilized region of the west. The westerner sat looking out of the window upon the dreary confusion of tracks, switches, frogs and snorting freight engines. Just at that moment he seemed like a man without a friend in the world, and out of pure sympathy the commercial traveller attempted to strike up a conversation.

"Got long to wait?" he asked, in a friendly tone.

"'Bout an hour," was the short answer.

"Going far?"

"Nigh onto a hundred miles back in the kentry."

"Yes, where?"

"Stranger, I'm going home. Home."

"So! Been away long?"

"'Bout ten years."

"Ten years, and now you are going home! Well, that's pleasant. I know I'm only away about a month at a time, yet when I come back, I'm as happy as a gosling in a sun-shower. Fact; you wouldn't think I'm sentimental, yet when I'm on my way home, the cars never seem to go fast enough, and I can't think of anything but home, home, all the time I'm there. My! but I'd like to be in your shoes for a short time, just to feel how happy you must be! Folks all well, I suppose?"

"Stranger, I'm going back to my mother's funeral. It's ten year, ten long, long year, since I saw her last, and then I went away saying I never wanted to see her again. I did that to my mother. But I was not much more than a boy then, and I didn't know what I was doing. It was my mother, but I'm not to be blamed too harshly.

"And after I went away I never sent a letter home—not one, but I always meant to. She used to write me such heart-breaking letters that I, great rough miner as I was, couldn't keep the tears back. You see, I didn't write because I was always a—a-thinking that I would strike rich, and then I would go home and just show the old folks what money and ease was; but—but—but, stranger, I put it off too long. I was going home next week. I was going to surprise 'em, and I had enough money to make their old age comfortable: but, stranger, she went home before I did."

And he wiped his horny, sunbrowned hand across his eyes. There was silence for a few minutes, then he continued:

"Don't think worse of me for that, stranger; I may be a man grown, but somehow I can't keep tears out of my eyes. They will come. You see, I was the youngest. I was the baby, her boy she used to call me; and when I grew up I wanted to see the world, to see life. But she wanted me to stay at home, and I was hot-headed and—and I went away. But I always dreamed of coming back, and here, when I was ready, it was too late, too late. Ah, stranger! I can't help it," and the returning miner bowed his head on his hands and was silent.

But the other said nothing. There was a lump in his throat that prevented, and he looked toward the window under pretence of wiping his forehead with his handkerchief. but it was only to conceal the moisture that came unbidden in his eyes.—Texas Siftings.

Two Beauties.

THE FAT ONE.

This is the fate of a fat beauty:

At 12—Plump, fat and ruddy. Weight, seventy pounds.

At 16—Plumper, fatter, exuberant and a bursting bud. Weight, 120 pounds.

At 20—A blossom bloomed, voluptuous, exuberant. Weight 160 pounds.

At 25—A full-blown Juno. Massive, statuesque. Approaching heroic size. Imposing. Begins to find car seats too small. Wedges when she sits down. Very exuberant. Weight 180 pounds.

At 30—Matronly. Imposing still, but the finer contour of form swallowed up slightly in adipose. Magnificent but barrel like.

At 35—Large. Too large. Complexion brick red. Double chin. Short of breath. Weght, 200 pounds.

At 40—Gone. Remains of a once magnificent woman. Vast remains. Imposing ruins. More double chin. Walk a waddle. Sad. Weight, 220 pounds.—[Graphic.

THE LEAN ONE.

This is the fate of a thin beauty:

At 12—Sickly, pale and uninteresting. Weight, forty pounds.

At 16—Delicate, slender, sprightly and graceful Weight, eighty pounds.

At 20—A study for a painter. Lithe, sinuous, Grecian in face and mould. Weight, 100 pounds

At 25—Queenly in form and motion, with a peachy complexion, small delicate hands and wee little feet. Weight, 120 pounds.

At 30—Beginning to fade; veins show on hands, cheek bones just indicated. Weight, 105 pounds.

At 35—Eyes retreating; fine lines on forehead; cheeks concave; form wiry. Weight, ninety pounds

At 40—Face hatchet shaped; nose and chin very sharp; two holes where the cheeks were; hands like claws; form all gone; a living skeleton. Weight seventy pounds.

Moral—You buys your wedding ring and takes your choice.—[Philadelphia Call.

An Elephant in Battle.

During a battle in India the driver of the elephant carrying the colors of the army had just given the command to halt when he was shot dead. The elephant never stirred a foot, refusing to advance or retire, as the conflict became hotter and fiercer, until the Mahrattas, seeing the standard still flying steadily in its place, refused to believe that they were being beaten and rallied again and again round the colors. And all this while, amid the din of battle, the patient animal stood straining its ears to catch the sound of that voice it would never hear again. At length the tide of conquest left the field deserted. Mahrattas swept on in pursuit of the flying foe, but the elephant [illegible] Three days and nights it remained where the [illegible] had given the command to halt. No bribe or threat could move it. They then sent to a village, 100 miles away, and brought the [illegible] little son. The noble hero seemed then to remember how the driver had sometimes given his authority to the little child, and immediately, with all the shattered trappings clanging as he went, paced quietly and slowly away.

Agricultural Items.

Illinois has 412 butter and cheese factories, most of them in the northern counties.

An acre of celery supplied the Boston market fifty years ago; now there are 50 acres raised annually within ten miles of the city, and this season importations were made from New York, Michigan and Prince Edward Island.

Mr. William Gardham tells the Canaan News that he finds his domestic animals afford an excellent market for surplus apples—including "forty young turkeys and plenty of chickens." the latter taking so many as a bushel a day. He prepares the fruit for their use by "merely mashing with the foot."

The recent outbreak of diphtheria in Canterbury, Eng., compelled belated attention to the polluted wells of the infected districts. The water of nearly sixty of them was found to be "contaminated with sewage and swarming with living organisms." With the wise hindsight which locks the stable door after the steed is stolen, these pest-holes have now been ordered closed.

Mr. W J. Scott, Bridgewater, N. Y. about fifteen years ago transplanted huckleberry bushes "of both the high and the low kinds," from a cold wet swamp to "dry gravelly soil—good corn land." They grow tall, better than in their native spot; "the berries are a great deal larger and produced by the bushel a good part of the season." His suggestions to others who may like to try this unique fruit culture we except from the husbandman: Set out young plants, about a foot high, in the spring. Mulch them for a year or two, and plough in some coarse horse manure occasionally. They are slow to start, but after they are started they grow rapidly, both in bush and berry. The bushes may be cultivated with a horse. They should be set at least seven feet apart each way, as they spread considerably when full grown. It is well to set three or four bushels to each hill.

President H. E. McKay, of the Mississippi Horticultural Society, after trying in his grounds, during ten years, about forty of the newest varieties of greatest promise, celebrate the Wilson in his recent Annual Address as "furnishing nearly or quite three-fourths of all the strawberries consumed in the United States": "The great facility with which it adapts itself to latitudes, soils and seasons in wonderful. Whatever other varieties do well, as a rule it does better. Where can we find another that has stood so long, and won so many battles, and to-day, after a test of nearly thirty years with the whole list of new and old, stands grandly and far in the lead of all? No parallel like it can be found in a single variety in any other department of fruit growing."

Mr. Geeoge T. Powell, Ghent, N. Y., at a recent meeting of the Columbia County Farmer's Club, of which be is president, remarked on the increased cost of timber—an expensive building material at best—and the necessity of economizing its use; and he suggested that there are several obvious advantages in utilizing for country houses and other structures the cheap and abundant material which in most cases is within easy reach—"sand, gravel and stones." He has shown his faith by putting up a concrete barn with walls twenty-four feet high, inclosing a space sixty-five by seventy feet.

The old notion that any soil is good enough to raise beans, is a mistaken one. In planning for next season's crop it will pay you to select one of your best pieces of ground for beans, and see that it is put in prime condition. While they will exist in a poor soil they will only do their best in a rich one. Given a good rich soil and good cultivation, beans will usually prove one of the most profitable crops on the farm.

Corn will shrink from the time it is husked from the field or shock, in well-protected cribs, from 20 to 30 per cent. by spring. That is 100 bushels will shrink to 70 to 80, according to how dry it was when gathered. Sound corn will shrink 20 per cent., so that 40 cents per bushel as it comes from the field is as good as 50 cents in the spring.

Recipes for "Home."

COOKIES—One cup butter, one cup sugar, two eggs, well beaten, one teaspoonful soda, and one tablespoonful ginger; flour to make a soft dough; roll thin and bake quickly.

ROLL JELLY CAKE—Three eggs, well beaten; one cup butter; one cup sugar; one cup flour; one teaspoonful soda, and nutmeg to suit your taste; bake ten minutes in long pan; spread with jelly and roll; wrap in a cloth around it till cool.

LAZY WOMAN'S PIE.—Two eggs, two tablespoons sugar, two heaping tablespoons flour, two-thirds of a pint of sweet milk; flavor same as custard pie, and bake without crust in a buttered pie-tin.

CURRANT PUDDING.—Two eggs, one-fourth cup sugar, two tablespoons butter, two-thirds pint sour milk, and one-half teaspoonful soda; flour enough to make a thick batter; then flour one teacupful of English currants, stir them in, and steam one and one-half hours; to be eaten with cream and sugar, or pudding sauce.

TO CAN FRUIT.—Put a teacupful of sugar for each can, in two quarts of water, boil and skim, then drop in fruit enough for one can, let it heat through, and can it. By this process your fruit will be whole and light colored.

LEMON JELLY.—Juice of one lemon, one cup sugar, one egg, one tablespoonful butter; boil till thick.

If you wash lemon stains in soda water before washing in other water, it will restore its natural color. Wet iron-rust or mildew in tartaric acid water and lay it in the sun, and it will take it out; wash the clothes as soon as the spots are gone or the acid will rot the clothes.

Variety in Farming.

It is the idea of many that any one can learn to farm. But as there are so many branches of farming any one of which require years of steady and close application to master by the best minds, it is deemed advisable for all farmers to avoid undertaking too many things. There are some vegetables, grains and fruits which have been raised so long [illegible] yet these simplest things require active minds, and close attention to business to produce profitably, and careful care and thought to sell to advantage. But there are many things, which require the undivided attention and study of the most active minds. It will not pay a man to [illegible] if any one attempts to carry on two or more of them at the same time, and while we would advise variety in farming, the diversity should be so selected that the one great division does not interfere with the care and absorbing attention of others. The successful farmer is most generally a specialist. It is not safe for a man to attempt to raise cattle, horses, hogs, and sheep for breeding purposes, at the same time keep a large number of cows and run an extensive dairy, or raise cane and have a sugar mill, or go extensively into grain and raise hogs for pork. This would be spreading too wide, and many, if not all of the enterprises will suffer neglect. One man's capacity is not sufficient for all of these complicated branches of industry. Better way is for a man to make himself a specialist—a success in one branch. Conquer it thoroughly. Nearly all men who have made themselves eminent in the world have devoted their lives to the one branch of study and industry. There is scarcely a branch of farm work but is full enough for one mind, if fully mastered and made a success. And this is especially the case with most of the new branches of farming which have been introduced within the last fifty years. If you look around it will be seen that previous to that time it was not expected or required that a farmer should be a man of hard study as well as hard work. But the new enterprises and plans of farming require the fullest exercise of both of these powers of man to keep abreast of the push and energy of the agricultural and commercial world, both of which are now required to be mastered to insure success.—Des Moines Register.

Daughter Slavery.

From the New York Letter.

Perhaps the most complete form of slavery to be seen in New York is slavery to one's daughters. All literature has paid homage to woman, but in our age practical life does it.

The New York wealthy man has a daughter or two. He pays but little attention to them while they are children, but it suddenly occurs to him that they are growing beautiful. His wife is sure of this fact and she begins to dress the girls while they are still children in all the elegance of princesses. They are sent to dancing-schools, to riding-schools, and to the finest seminary and put in the opera-box, allowed to know what is going on at all the theatres, and carried to the watering-places, and before they know anything of their country they are sent to Europe, where, as my friend, the consul, who has just arrived, says he has seen girls not 17 years of age provided with wardrobes of 15 to 30 silk dresses, with hose of variegated silk, diamonds in their ears, and everything that life ought to yield toward its termination they are satiated with upon the very threshold. With fine food and wine their complexions become elegant; they are seldom away from the dentist's a week having their teeth fixed. The most cosmopolitan society is introduced to them, and they look down with indifference upon the boys of their own age; or, if they marry by an act of nature, soon upbraid their husbands for not keeping up the luxury their parents spoiled them with.

Refreshments For a Little Party.

A correspondent asks for information in regard to the refreshments she shall serve at a little party of twelve or fifteen persons. A few dishes, perfect of their kind are much more satisfactory than a great variety less daintly prepared. Sandwiches made of bread baked the day before, and of nicely minced boiled ham, seasoned with a little vinegar and mustard and a few drops of oil, with coffee for which genuine cream has been provided, may well come first then chicken salad with cucumber pickles and olives; after which serve cream with two or three kinds of cake, and if you choose, grapes and oranges. The oranges should be partly peeled and the skin divided in eighths, and the points turned over toward the orange itself. If this is done an hour before they are to be served the peel will keep its place. If the refreshments are served at small tables, at which two ladies and two gentlemen sit, two finger bowls are all that need be placed there, immediately after they have indicated in some way that they have finished supper. At whist parties, where time is to be considered, it is best to use the small tables, so that those who have an unfinished game on their minds can complete it speedily, while it is still possible to remember that the jack or ten spot are now high. —N. Y. Post.

Heavy Carcasses of Fat Meat.

From the housekeepers' and the commercial point of view, as wonderful as these mighty piles of meat were as examples of what perfection the breeding and feeding of cattle have attained, it was very plainly apparent that two or three points have been carried too far. The carcasses were too fat for profitable consumption, and also for canning or salting and altogether too large for any economical use. The buyer wants a whole porterhouse or lion steak if any, and at least a two rib roast if a roast at all; but how many are there who ask for four or five pounds of steak in a single cut or a two-rib roast weighing 20 or 25 pounds! Then as to the fat compared with the lean, 60 per cent. of the former to 40 per cent of the latter would not be an unfair estimate, to say nothing of the bone which with the fat must be thrown out, making beef from very heavy and fat carcasses very dear food indeed.—Rural New Yorker.

Cheese as Food.

Mr. Matthieu Williams tells us that we do not begin to know the value of cheese in cooking, and is responsible for the statement (as the London Queen gives it) that twenty pounds of cheese contains as much nutrition as there is in a whole sheep weighing sixty pounds. Considering the difference in cost between cheese and mutton this is certainly news for the house-provider. Except as Welsh rarebit maccaroni au gratin and the fancies in cheese pastry for desert, the valuable "casein" is little used in cooking, although cheese porridge, cheese rice, and the addition of cheese, to mashed potato, to boiled mush, and to hasty pudding, are all known to be appetizing. Now all of these preparations are said to be equal in food-value to beef and mutton, which should certainly help to make them popular. In his cooking lectures Mr. Williams dissolves his cheese in milk or water, and adds a little saleratus to it, (bi-carbonate of potash,) which brings it back to its original soluble form. Most of the cook-book recipes for using cheese require the addition of egg, which is an item of expensiveness in midwinter, so that plain grated cheese in the simple dishes mentioned, with oatmeal, with buckwheat, with rice, with potato, are quite novelties. The Single Woman.

From the Southern Exchange.

There is no sweeter and no more interesting character, whether in fiction or in real life, than the spinster who has, for some reason, refused a lover's proposal, and being now past the hour of old maid. The ordeal through which she has passed seems to have refined her feelings, and if [illegible] is drawn to her the regards of all who know her history. Such a one is generally lovable and sympathetic, forward in all good works, the warm friend of married men and women, the confidante of many a tender passion. Age does not wither the beauty of her disposition. She never slanders, never retails ill natured gossip; but on the other hand, though prompt to put in a seasonable word on a crisis, does not deem it her mission to set all the people around her right. She makes an admirable aunt, and is very necessary to the comfort of a large circle of cousins. Many a young fellow on the threshold of life bears a kindly remembrance of her for the good nature and tact with which she helped him to steer clear of shoals where he might otherwise have been wrecked.

Contagious Diseases Among Cattle.

The reception of the committee from cattle growers at the Chicago convention by the committees on agriculture of both houses of congress is gratifying to those who hope something will come from all this effort. The prevailing feeling is favorable to legislation. The danger is that too many plans will be presented and insisted on by their originators as being the best and only good one.

There is no doubt that bills will be introduced with the approval of the committees in congress and may be passed without serious objection. It will be well, however, for the cattle interest to inform their representatives in congress of their wishes in this matter.

Some are still so incredulous as to think there is no no such thing as pleuro pneumonia in this country, but in this they show only their ignorance.

"Are You Going To Kiss Me?"

From The Belfast (Me.) Journal.

If ever I go into a new locality again, I will study up my geography better than I did this time; for my ignorance got me into a most uncomfortable position. As the boat neared Sanford, I was standing with others on the deck, when a very pretty young lady came up to me, and with a sweet smile on her face, looked into mine with a pair of lovely eyes, and asked: "Are you going to kiss me, sir?" If some one had offered to lend me ten dollars I could not have been more surprised, and hardly knowing what to say, and in order to gain a little time, I gasped out, "Pardon, Miss, what did you ask?" I felt that she knew I heard her, but she said sweetly, "Are you going to kiss me, to-night?" There was no misunderstanding her this time. I heard her, and so did others, and I felt the blood rushing into my face, and I stammered out, "I would like to accomodate you, Miss; I would truly; but I have a wife and thirteen small children on board with me, and if my wife should see me kissing you——" "Kissing me, you hateful old thing! who asked you to kiss me?" "You did," I yelled; "You asked me twice!" "You old fool, I asked you if you were going to Kissime—Kissime City to-night; don't you know anything?" and off she went, and if ever anybody felt meaner than I did I would like to exchange photographs with him.

The Marquis De Talleyrand.

A few years after the war, this French nobleman came to Florida with his rich American wife, Miss Curtiss, of New York, and purchased a large tract of land, beautifying it until it blossomed like the rose. Here he erected a handsome house and expensive stables, employing a retinue of French servants, also a secretary and landscape gardener. His elegant and costly equipages rolled through the streets with their liveried outriders, attracting the attention of both rich and poor, and when the Marquis and Marchioness appeared on horseback, she with a bright colored costume and a tall hat with waving plumes, and the Marquis in knee breeches and silk stockings, the people looked, admired, and wondered; but they wondered still more when the titled gentleman brought garden truck and sold it, reckoning his gains and haggling for pence like common men. It was said that the wife of the nobleman urged his retirement to this remote portion of the globe, hoping to wean him from a profligate life; but in a few years he became weary of the quiet monotony, quarreled with his secretary and servants, and suddenly departed for the North. At the breaking out of the Franco-Prussian war he sailed for his native country, to lend a helping hand, but is now living quietly among the vine-clad hills of France. The old place here beside the shining river was fast going to decay, when a kinsman of the Marchioness arrived and took possesion, devoting himself to the improvement of the grounds and to literary labors.

The Fatal Poison of the Cup.

Henry Ward Beecher in a Late Sermon.

I feel sore at heart now. One of the noblest natures that used to sit in these seats, and one I loved and who loved me; whose hand was as large in its generosity as a prairie; who had all the prospets of a noble and useful life, who could restrain himself and stop when he'd a mind to. But he has gone, gone down to such a degree of intemperance that his friends have given him up in despair. How many of that kind have I seen; and the time past did not suffice for him, or for them. They say: To be sure I know I drink a little; but it is not a necessity for me; I can give it up today. But they don't; and they don't next year, or the year after; and when they hear the roar of the tide of perdition, over the verge of which they will plunge finally, they can't. The time when men ought to stop is when they first see the peri; when there is time enough for judgement, enough to bring the higher qualities of the mind to sit in judgement over the lower.

A Successful Editor.

John A. Cockerill, managing editor of the New York World, is supposed to be the best-paid newspaper man in this country. His salary is $10,000 a year, and in addition to this sum, he derives a handsome income from certain shares of stock in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, presented him some years ago Mr. Pulitzer. Nobody envies him his good fortune; he has honestly earned it by hard conscientious and good work. In 1879 he was out of employment in Cincinnati, and offered to go to work for B. M. Chambers, proprietor of the St. Louis Times, for $25 a week. Chambers was a clumsy amateur and knew nothing of Cockerill's splendid abilities, and so paid no attention to his letters. Cockerill's streak of good luck seems to have struck him when he associated himself with Pulitzer. The partnership is a strange one, and was sneered at and laughed at for a long time. When Cockerill first went to the St. Louis Post-Dispatch everybody predicted he would quit in disgust in less than two months. That was four years ago. For four years Pulitzer and he have been as mildly friendly as sucking doves, and their cooperation is a matter of record.

W. W. Astor, the American Minister at Rome, lives a very secluded life, only giving an occasional dinner party to the Legation. The Rospigliosi Palace, where he resides, is as closely shut up as though there were no American Minister there.

A BURGLAR'S CHAT.

The Enterprising Housebreaker and His Victims—Side Lights on a Dark Art.

From the Boston Herald.

"Never kill a man save in self defense; get caught rather than drop a man," was the prudent motto of a celebrated cracksman. "It is only the tyro of the bungler who flourishes revolvers and quickly appeals to the bludgeon."

"What is the prime quality in your business?"

"Nerve—nothing else."

"What is the best method?"

"Boldness. Many a job have I done right before the eyes of the people; done it as though it was the regular thing and I was just where I ought to be. I have had my pal taking things out of a house when a couple of cops were walking by, and stood with a pencil in my hand keeping tally of the things. They thought it was all right, as I looked right at them. I tell you a fellow wants to keep perfectly cool and know what he is doing and what he is going to do every time.

"The right kind of men are somehow lacking. They are either too timid or too rough. It wants a fine man, a real Damascus blade, to do a neat job. There are plenty of opportunities, if there were only the men to fill them. But I was speaking of chances. The people are asleep; you are awake. They are timid; you are perfectly cool. You know just what to do. You know just what they will do if they wake up. They don't know how many are in the house, nor where you are. Most people are cowards in the night. Without any odds you could get the best of them, but in the night, with the bugbear and the reality of a burglar in the house—and they have spent all the years of their lives in working up a dreadful fellow in their imaginations—in such a plight, a man's house is like a foreign land to him, and he is a perfect stranger to the situation in his own home."

"Then you trust most to bewilderment and fear?"

"No, we don't. A good job means getting in and out again without stirring things up. If it comes to the worst, then the dread and fear and confusion which we cause all help us, and sometimes the more fuss there is the easier we can get off."

"How do you feel when you are alone in a house at midnight running such terrible risks?"

"There, now, you have got as much nonsense into that question as they usually do. In the first place, midnight is not the usual hour when a house is worked. Things are not so quiet generally as they are two hours later. And then, if it were midnight, what of it? Midnight, expect to cowards, is no different from any other hour, only as it is a great deal safer for those like us. Alone in a house? It is a little shaky at times, but generally safe enough; but that isn't the way a house is generally worked. There should be two, and three are better. Terrible risks? We don't think of it in that light. There is something always fascinating in the risk, and it isn't considered objectionable. What do we think? How do we feel? Now, look here, there isn't much time nor occasion for thinking and feeling outside the job to be done. Your sentimental chaps don't want to be prowling about nights on any of these delicate 'rackets.' The man who is going to stop in a bedroom of a strange house at 2 o'clock at night to consult his feelings had better keep out of that bedroom. The man who proposes to enter this profession wants to run slow on the thinking and feeling lines, especially when on duty."

"How does an operator feel when he is confronted by some inmate?"

"In the first place, he feels that something must be done pretty d——d quick. Dodge 'em if you can, but no fooling, anyhow. Do anything short of killing, if necessary. The women are the hardest to manage, except a man who can wake up cool and has his weapons handy. That is the time that tries a man and puts him on his mettle. If it comes to that it's really desperate for somebody, but a man has no business to run the risk unless there's a big stake. The funniest experience I ever had was when I went into a bedroom one night where there was one man asleep. I was at the bureau drawers, and, looking into the glass, I saw him sit bolt upright and look at me. I turned pretty quick, you may believe, but he never stirred nor spoke. I didn't move after turning round, but looked at him and he at me. I very soon saw that he was not awake. gathered up the swag and walked round the bed to the door, but his eyes vere on me all the while. I got out of he room safely, and he never spoke or afterward made any disturbance. I idn't stay much longer in that house."

"How is it about the women?"

"They are curious. Some of them ill bury themselves under the bedothes, while others will spring at you o a she tiger. A good many will gladlet you take any thing you want if u will only keep away from them. e fainting kind are the best; they soon laid out, the 'screechers' make rumpus they are no ways reason-e. There is only one thing to do—out of it the easiest way possible."

Under Fire.

he spirit of soldiers is shown by r remarks when under fire. At the e of the Alma, during the Crimean , the Ninety-third Highlanders were ncing under fire of shell and rifle-. One shell, bursting, knocked three or four men, and blew into nents the upper part of the feather et of another Highlander. "Eh, I they're wanting my feather hat!" claimed, with a laugh, as he con-l to advance in his place.

Balaclava, where the magnificent olish charge of "the six hundred's ade, the Highlanders were formed he top of a hill to repel an onset sian cavalry. Their Turkish allies, right and left, after firing a con-volley, fled in disorder.

Conlin Campbell rode down the ental line, formed only two deep. ere is no retreat from here, men!" said. "You must die where you nd!"

Ay, ay, Sir Colin, and needs be we'll that!" shouted back a brave Scotch-e Russians charged at full gallop to-ds that thin line, for Sir Conlin did think it worth while to form them deep, the usual formation when alry are to be repelled. The Mus-ites rushed on, unchecked by a vol at six hundred yards. The Scotch stood firm as a rock. When the hing horsemen were within two hun-d yards, and in another half-min would have been upon them, there a flash from the Highlanders' rifles. ro ling away of the smoke disclosed Russians scampering back, even fast-han they had charged. Scarcely a or horse escaped un-wounded. ring the engagement, an amusing in-nt showed that the wives of the landers were fitting companions heir brave husbands. Mrs. Smith, vife of a private of the Ninety-third, washer woman, were in one of the which the regiment had left stand-hen it marched to the battle-field. e runaway Turks passed through the Highlanders' camp, and one of them entered Mrs. Smith's tent. She, being a large, powerful woman, resented the liberty and desertion by seizing the collar of his coat and kicking him until he was glad to break away from her. From that day the Turks called her "Kokana" [Turkish for woman] Smith."

Two Husbands.

In Montgomery, Ala. in 1860, the marriage of young X—— to the charming Miss Y—— was the event of the season in the circles where the happy couple were best known. Everything for a time went on delightfully, but it was not many months before the sulphurious cloud of war enveloped the land, and the patriotic husband, with thousands of others, bade his wife a tearful farewell and rushed to the fight to fight for the Confederacy. As the crimson years of that sanguinary period rolled on they brought mournful tidings to the devoted wife at home. Among the braves who bit dust in a hard-fought battle poor X—— was reported among the deaths and the margled body was thrown into a nameless grave. In the course of time the grief-stricken widow recovered something of the naturally buoyant and joyous spirits. She met Mr. Z——, and a mutual attachment sprung up, quickly ripening into love. Mr. Z—— knew her story, sympathized with her grief for the dead husband, and after a happy courtship married her in a lonely Georgia town where she then resided. Mr. and Mrs. Z—— lived happy together, as everybody had predicted, and in due season three blooming children were sent to gladden their hearts. Unhappily the story does not end here. Sometime ago Mr. Z—— was astonished to learn that X——, the first husband, was not killed in the war, as reported and generally believed. Worse, still, the man was then living, and in every respect as unlike a corpse as a living man could be. Both Mr. and Mrs. Z—— were thunderstruck, dazed, and utterly overwhelmed by this discovery.

After the first paroxysm of despair and desperation, Z——, who is a man of prompt decision, abandoned the longtime partner of his joys and sorrows, the mother of his children, and declared his determination of living apart from her. Seeking legal advice, Z—— concluded that the next step in order was to have the legal status of the parties to the unfortunate union definitely settled by the courts. With this object in view the bewildered and grieved husband has instructed his attorneys to file a bill in equity in Fulton Supreme Court. In this bill the complainant, after clearly stating the essential facts detailed above, prays that the state's writ of subpœna be directed to his alleged wife commanding her to appear before the court, and that, in order to have his relation to the defendant and society determined, and the legal status of his three children fixed, said marriage be annulled.

The children of this peculiarly sad marriage are now living, and are aged respectively 17, 15 and 13 years. Where the first husband is, and what he thinks of the tangle, the reporter could not learn, but the case as it stands is sufficiently pathetic to touch every heart.—Atlanta (Ga.) Constitution.

STEEL BAKED AND PICKLED

Strange Sights and Sounds in the Bit Factories of Connecticut.

There are in the United States fourteen bit factories, and eleven of them are in Connecticut, and here in the town of Chester, within a radius of two miles can be found no less than six of these eleven. The visitor here is sure to have his curiosity aroused by the din of many trip hammers. On visiting one of the factories he will first enter the forging room on the ground floor, where a busy and curious spectacle is presented. His sense of hearing at once become useless, as the clatter and clang of a multiplicity of heavy running machinery makes conversation impossible except for a man of strong lung power. From the ceiling are suspended long rows of heavy shafting filled with driving pulleys from six inches to as many feet in diameter. Instead of a floor the visitor walks on clay, packed as hard and smooth as cement, and on which are carelessly thrown in heaps tons and tons of red-hot bits. He sees long bars of cold steel placed between strong shears, which cut them into appropriate lengths as easily and quickly as a lady would cut a piece of string with her scissors. Here a line of sturdy men stand beside glowing forges in which these bars of steel are placed until they are heated to a white heat, when they are immediately put under trip hammers, which striking hundreds of blows in a minute, hammer the bars flat on one end, round in the the center, and square on the other end. The bit has now started into existence, and is called in this form a "plate." It is next passed to the crimpers, who again heat it to whiteness and run it through machines which twist the flat end into a "pod," or spiral of beautiful regularity. The "swedgers" seize it now, and again under the influence of the blowpipe the steel is soon red hot, when one blow from a powerful drop fashions the square end into a shank properly beveled for the bit brace; again it is heated and passed under another drop which stamps on its shank a figure telling the size of the hole it will bore when finished. Once more it endures the fiery ordeal, and, glowing red, passes through the heading presses, which, with a hug and a squeese, crush two inches of the twisted end into a mass in which you faintly discern the point spurs and cutting edges of the future bit. It is next carried into the annealing room, where, with thousands of others, it is buried beneath heaps of charcoal and thoroughly baked until the steel is well softened or annealed. Next it is pickled for several hours in vats containing a strong solution of sulphuric acid, which eats off all the scale left by the many previous heatings in the forges.

The bit now passes into the machine room, where the rasping machine cuts out all superfluous stock in the head, forming and cutting edges. The milling machine cuts the point smoothly to the correct level, ready for the screw to be made upon it. The leveling machine smooths the bottom of the blades, the facing-back machine cuts the edges of the blades straight, the screw-cutting machine forms the threads on the point, and the sizing machine cuts the boring end to the exact diameter required. And still the bit is but half made.

You pass into another department, and there you see long rows of skilled mechanics seated upon high stools, each man having in front of him a heap of bits and a lot of files of various sizes and forms, known as "square," "round," "flat," "half-round," "humpback," "ground off," and "feather edge," and each of these is used in turn to form and smooth the various parts and cutting surfaces of the bit. The squeaking of a hundred files of almost as many sizes and shapes fills the air with shrill notes and sets your teeth on edge.

You pause for a moment to watch a couple of men, who, seated in front of tiny forges, are heating the bits to a cherry red color and then dipping them in dishes of oil and water. You learn that they are tempering them to the proper degree of hardness for cutting. You also learn that although they can control the temper of the steel, they cannot control their own—when they burn their fingers.

You now open a door lettered "Polishing Room," and start back at the scene which meets your gaze. A living reproduction of Dante's dream is before you. Men with faces blackened by charcoal dust and emery stand in long rows, while a sheet of fire five or six feet long plays from the hand of each, lighting up their blackened features and making them look like veritable demons. Each man holds in his hand a bit and presses it upon the polishing wheel, which makes many thousand revolutions in a minute, causing by its friction a great sheet of sparks to fly out in front of the operator. You behold the many different processes of finishing the bits until at last they look as bright as burnished silver.

In the packing room many men are sharpening the finished bits, and a few inspectors are examining them with magnifying glasses to see if they can detect any scratches that have been left by the polisher. Here also the bits are sorted into the first and second quality, stamped with the manufacturer's name and trade mark, wrapped in strips of paper, and packed in paste-board boxes. You are astonished at the variety of sizes and forms, running from dowel bin, hardly an inch long, up to car bits more than two feet in length, and from the little bit cutting a hole but three-sixteenths of an inch in diameter to the great six inch auger, which requires two strong men to turn it. You are struck, too, by the oddly shaped machine bits and the curious mortising bit which bores a square hole.—Chester, Conn. Corr. New York Sun.

A WOMAN'S SACRIFICE.

A Strange Scene in a Court-Room—Marrying and Dismissing a Stranger for the Sake of the Man She Loved.

From a Buffalo Letter.

The story of a strange marriage is told in a dispatch from Erie to the Courier to-day. In brief form it is as follows: Saturday morning, when Justice Freeman, of Erie, opened court, there sat on one of the benches a well-dressed and beautiful young woman. When the cases on hand were disposed of she arose and asked his Honor if he was duly qualified to perform the marriage rite. Receiving an affirmative reply, she beckoned to an exceedingly uncouth, middle-aged man, sitting at the back of the room, and said to the Justice:

"I want you to marry me to this man."

The man went forward and stood before the desk, looking the picture of sheepishness.

"Is this the husband of your choice, madam?" inquired the Justice, looking at the couple with intense surprise.

"I believe so. Are you the husband of my choice, Mr. Traynor?"

"Yes, ma'am, I am," replied the man, with a sly grin.

Justice Freeman informed the woman that it was customary to hand in the names and addresses of the contracting parties. The couple then stepped back a few paces and conferred for a moment. Then they sat down at a table and the woman handed the man a sheet of paper. He made a move which the Justice interpreted to mean that he was not acquainted with the art of writing. A contemptuous smile passed over the woman's face, and, taking the pen, she scrawled with aristocratic regularity the names of Amelia A. Royce, Cincinnati, and Charley Traynor, Utica, N. Y. Then the couple stood up and were made man and wife, according to the laws of Pennsylvania.

The husband stood as though bewildered. When the ceremony was completed. Justice Freeman produced a marriage certificate, but the bride begged him to desist: "You will make a record of this marriage, sir; and that will be of more value than this sentimental but silly picture card," said she.

Then she turned to the groom, and intimated that he would lose his train if he wasted too much time. He smirked, and remarked that it would not distress his much to miss the train. He was coldly informed that his absence was preferred to his company, and that he was to go about his business as quickly as possible. Some papers were handed to him, and, after a few words, uttered in a low tone, the man took his hat, bid the bride good-day, and left the court room. The bride remained. "I think you think some explanation is due you," she said to the justice. "There is nothing wrong in all this; no crime, no despair, broken hearts, nothing tragic. I am simply putting it out of my power to say 'yes' to the only man on earth it would please and hurt me to marry—the only man on earth I care for. For reasons that I have no desire to tell I cannot marry this gentleman without bringing great sorrow upon him and me in the future. And as I am only a woman, capable of being tempted to marry the man I love, I have married a stranger and so placed myself beyond the reach of temptation. This is all there is in it. I shall go home and live as I have always lived, and love as I always have loved. It is not likely that I shall see this man Traynor again. He perfectly understands that he was hired to marry me and then go about his business."

The astonished magistrate was then requested to forward copies of papers, containing her marriage notice to the Baltimore Sun, the Washington Critic, and the Denver Tribune. She seemed particularly anxious that her marriage should be made public, also the fact that she remained in the room after her husband left it to catch the train. Justice Freeman's theory is that insanity is the trouble she feared to bring upon herself and the man she loves.

Probably a Domed Lie.

A curious story concerning certain fresco decorations of the capitol dome at Washington has recently been revived in a way that may create something of a sensation. Immediately after the war, when the painting in the interior of the rotunda was finished by Brindini, the Italian artist, it was commonly said that the heads of the figures in the group of tyrants being dispersed by the Goddess of Liberty were exact representations of certain leading characters of the southern confederacy, also that the goddess was an admirable portrait of a handsome Washington female with whom the artist maintained a close friendship and who for a long time passed as his wife. The truth of the story was vigorously denied at the time, but ever since then scores of people who have come to Washington and gazed up into the dome have been startled by the wonderful similarity of the heads to those of certain southern leaders.

Brindini died a short time ago, and there are several persons in Washington who knew him intimately who are now willing to admit that while the artist was executing the work, during the war, he expressed a determination to put in the faces of confederate chieftains to represent the tyrants thus perpetuating their infamy as rebels against the government. The faces bear a striking resemblance to those of Alexander H. Stephens, Robert E. Lee, Stonewall Jackson, Judah P. Benjamin and Robert Toombs. The scene is a dramatic one. The figures representing the five tyrants are emerging from a cloud and in the attitude of shrinking in terror from the Goddess of Liberty, who, clad in ancient Greek garb, is descending upon them, sword in hand. A prominent lawyer in this city, and also a well-known newspaper men, both of unquestioned veracity are among those who claim that Brindini acknowledged that the faces were those of the five confederate leaders named above. The woman whose figure was made to serve as the avenging goddess is still in Washington. Through once fair and willowy, she is now fat and 50, and has little about her suggestive of the ethereal,

A member of congress said Sunday that if the accuracy of this story should be irrefutably established there may come a time, under changed administration of public affairs, when the powers that be will engage a new artist to rub out the realistic work of Brindini and substitute a group that will not be an unpleasant reminder to one portion of the country.

A Frenchman on English Women.

One Max O'Rell has recently writen a book on "John Bull and His Island." which contains a good many things which ought to interest American ladies. Some of them are here repriated, having special reference to English femininity.

"English women are remarkable for their fresh complexions, their decided and fearless gait, and the length of their feet, which reminds one that twelve inches go to the foot in England. Impossible to make faux pas with such bases as these. They can not lose their center of gravity. They have only the beauty of youth. An English woman is seldom handsome after 30. In many respects the Englishwoman is superior to the French woman; she is more natural; she is less subject to vapors, and does not regularly get her migraine. She is not so naive as the young French girl, but, on the other hand, she is less childish. She goes out without her mamma and her maid, gives you a hearty grasp of the hand, and looks you unblushingly in the face. Unmarried, free as the air, she may go to the theater, take a walk, or even a journey, with male companions; she is the leader of society, indispensable at all social gatherings and pleasure parties. Married, she does not boast of leading her husband by the nose; she attends to her house and her children; she does not make love to her husband, but neither does she make love to other men. If she is not more demonstrative toward the former, it is, in a great measure, his own fault; he permits no liberties to be taken with him. The Englishman has not the bump of amativeness; his neck, on an average, does not measure more than fourteen inches; her enticing ways would be entirely lost upon him. In her dignity the Englishwoman refrains from making advances toward her lord and master for fear of their not being met with approval. With us a too strict watch over our children, and the fear of giving them to much liberty, engender a love of the secret and mysterious. Everything in an English education tends to make young people self-reliant. No mother or governess would think of opening a letter addressed to her daughter or pupil; the girl has her own private correspondence as sacred as that of her elders. No letters received on the sly; no letters written to young sweethearts at midnight. The absence of suspicion destroys the charm of mystery. * * * Gentlemen never use objectionable expressions among themselves, nor indulge in risky jokes in the company of ladies."

It may well be suspected that this is something over couleur de rose, but there is some good sense in it all the same. And if the gallant Gaul is so charmed with the freedom of English society, how he would be enchanted with its exaggeration in America! But turn to another page of the spicy little book, and one stumbles on something which wears a somewhat different visage:

"Adultery is frequent in the higher classes, among the rich and idle; very rare among the middle and working classes. I do not mention the lower populace of London; their life is that of dogs.

'A married man', said an Englishman of some importance to me one day, 'is very foolish to be unfaithful to his wife. Why on earth should one blight one's peace of mind? Is not one woman as good as another? In nine divorce cases out of ten the co-respondent is an officer in her Majesty's service. An officer and a gentleman, having nothing particular to do in time of peace, is fond of keeping his hand in by shooting over other peoples preserves. The co-respondent is not unfrequently a young groom, as one may see by the newspapers. This sample of co-respondents begin at the spur; it is not very far to the garter; the path is very attractive, que voulez vous? Between the 1st of July, 1882, and 1st of January, 1883, I counted seven cases of these favored flunkeys in the newspapers, How many must there be still enjoying their good fortunes on the quiet!"

"O Max, Max! You naughty Frenchman! Your facts are bad enough, but your inference is just too awful." Why couldn't you leave argument for those only who can "read between the lines?"

Cash Answer to Prayer.

A special to the Boston Globe from Akron, O., says: "Harrison Ramon lived for many years in Hinckley, Medina county, O., and amassed considerable property; most of which was in cash. He would not trust his money to the keeping of a bank, but had it about his own premises, keeping the hiding place secret even from his own family. A short time ago he told his wife that he had hidden about $30,000 in money, and that pretty soon he would inform her of its whereabouts, so that in case of his death, she would know where to look for it. He neglected to do this, and about a week ago he died of apoplexy. After his death an examination of his papers showed that he had $335,000 in money hidden about his premises. The most thorough search failed to reveal the hiding place, and the widow began to despair. Then she was impressed with the notion that if she prayed with faith the Lord would direct her to the place where the money was hidden. Wednesday she prayed all day and night. Thursday morning she was impelled to go to the beehives, which stood on a bench near the house, and in the excitement of expectation she knocked over one of the hives, disclosing to her view the top of a bench with a pile of greenbacks of large denomination upon it. A search under the other hives resulted in finding a total of $15,000. In the afternoon one of the family dropped a bunch of keys through the barn floor, which necessitated taking up a plank to find them, and when the young man put his hand down he struck a half-gallon fruit jar, which he pulled out to find partly filled with $20 gold pieces. Other jars and a grain bag were also found containing gold and silver, and when it had all been counted the total amount figured up over $213,000. The widow was overjoyed, and in her statement to the correspondent said she believed that the discoveries were in direct answer to her prayers.

THE DEACON'S WEEK.

BY ROSE TERRY COOK.

The communion service of January was just over in the church at Sugar Hollow, and people were waiting for Mr. Parkes to give out the hymn, but he did not give it out; he laid his book down on the table, and looked about his church.

He was a man of simplicity and sincerity, fully in earnest to do his Lord's work, and do it with all his might, but he did sometimes feel discouraged. His congregation was a mixture of farmers and mechanics, for Sugar Hollow was cut in two by Sugar brook, a brawling noisy stream that turned the wheel of many a mill and manufactory; yet on the hill around it there was a scattered population eating their bread in the full perception of the primeval curse. So he had to contend with the keen brain and skeptical comment of the men who piqued themselves on power to hammer at theological problems as well as hot iron; with the jealousy and repulsion and bitter feeling that has bred the communistic hordes abroad and at home while, perhaps, he had a still harder task to awaken the sluggish souls of those who used their days to struggle with barren hillside and rocky pasture for mere food and clothing, and their nights to sleep the dull sleep of physical fatigue and mental vacuity.

It seemed sometimes to Mr. Parkes that nothing but the trump of Gabriel could arouse people from their sins; and make them believe on the Lord and follow his footsteps. To-day, no—a long time before to-day—he had mused and prayed till an idea took shape in his thought, and now he was to put it in practice; yet he felt peculiarly responsible and solemnized; as he looked about him and forebode the success of his experiment. Then there flashed back to the habitual reader, the noble utterance of Gamaliel concerning Peter and his brethern when they stood before the council: "If this council or this work be of men, it will come to naught; but if it be of God, ye cannot overthrow it."

So, with the sense of strength the minister spoke: "My dear friends," he said, "you all know, though I did not give any notice to that effect, that this week is the week of prayer. I have a mind to ask you to make it for this once a week of practice instead. I think we may discover some of the things of God in this manner, that a succession of prayer-meetings would not perhaps, so thoroughly reveal to us, Now, when I say this, I don't mean to have you go home and vaguely endeavor to walk straight in the old way; I want you to take 'topics,' as they are called, for the prayer-meetings. For instance, Monday is prayer for the temperance work. Try all that day to be temperate in speach, in act, in indulgence of any kind that is hurtful to you. Tuesday is for Sunday-Schools; go and visit your scholars, such of you as are teachers, try to feel that they have living souls to save. Wednesday is a day for fellowship meeting; we are cordially invited to attend a meeting of this sort at Bantam. Few of us can go twenty-five miles to be with our brethren there; let us spend that day cultivating our brethren here, let us go to see those who have promoted breaches of friendship, confess our shortcomings one to another, and act as if, in our Master's words, 'All ye are brethren.'

"Thursday is the day to pray for the family relation; let us each try to be to our families on that day, in our measure, what the Lord is to his family, the church, remembering the words, 'Fathers, provoke not your children to anger;' 'Husbands, love your wives, and be not bitter against them.' These are texes rarely commented upon, I have noticed, in our conference meetings; we are more apt to speak of the obedience due from children and the meekness our wives owe us, forgetting that duties are always reciprocal.

"Friday the church is to be prayed for. "Let us then, each for himself, try to act that day just as we think Christ, our great example, would have acted in our place. Let us try to prove to ourselves and the world about us that we have not taken upon us his name lightly or in vain. Saturday is prayer day for the heathen and foreign missions. Brethern, you know and I know that there are heathens at our doors here; let every one who will take that day to preach the gospel to some one who does not hear it anywhere else. Perhaps you will find work that ye know not lying in your midst. And let all on. Saturday evening meet here again and chose one brother to relate his experience of the week. You who are willing to try this method please rise."

Everybody rose except old Amos Tucker, who never stirred though his wife pulled at him and whispered to him imploringly. He shook his grizzled head and sat immovable.

"Let us sing the doxology," said Mr. Parkes, and it was sung with full fervor. The new idea had roused the church fully; it was something fixed and positive to do; it was the lever-point that Archimedes longed for, and each one felt ready and strong enough to move the world.

Saturday night the church assembled again. The cheerful eagerness was gone from their faces; they looked downcast, troubled, weary—as the pastor expected. When the box for ballots was passed about each one tore a bit of paper from the sheet of the hymn-books for the purpose and wrote on it a name.

The pastor said, after he had counted them: "Deacon Emmons, the lot has fallen on you."

"I'm sorry for't," said the deacon, rising and taking off his overcoat. "I hain't got the best of records, Mr. Parkes now I tell ye."

"That isn't what we want," said Mr. Parkes. "We want to know the whole experience of some one among us, and we know you will not tell us either more or less than what you did experience."

Deacon Emmons was a short, thick-set man, with a shrewd kindly face, and grey hair, who kept the village store and had a well-earned reputation for honesty.

"Well, brethern," he said, "I dunno why I shouldn't tell it. I am pretty well ashamed of myself, no doubt but I ought to be, and maybe I shall profit by what I've found out these six days back, I'll tell you just as it come—Monday I looked about me to begin with. I am amazing fond of coffee, and it ain't good for me; the doctor says it ain't; but dear me, it does set a man up good, cold mornings, to have a cup of hot, sweet, tasty drink, and I haven't had the grit to re use. I knew it made me what other folks call nervous, but I call cross, before night comes; and I know it fetched on a spell of low spirits, when our folks couldn't get a word out of me—not a good one, any way, so I thought I'd try on that to begin with. I tell you it come hard. I hankered after that drink of coffee dreadful. Seemed as though I could not eat my breakfast without it. I know how to pity a man that loves liquor more'n ever I did in my life before, but I feel sure they can stop it if they try; for I stopped and am goin' to stay stopped.

"Well, come to dinner, there was an other fight. I do set by pie the most of anything. I was fetched up on pie, as you might say. Our folks always had it three times a day, and the doctor has been talkin' and talkin' to me about eatin' pie. I have the dyspepsy like everything, and it makes me useless by spells and as unreliable as a weather-cock. An' Doctor Drake, he says there won't nothing help me but a diet. I was readin' the Bible that morning while I was waiting for breakfast, for't was Monday, and wife was kind of set back with washin' and all, and I come across that part where it says that the bodies of Christians are temples of the Holy Ghost. Well, thinks I, we'd ought to take care of 'em if they be, and see that they are kept clean and pleasant, like the church; and no body can be clean nor pleasant that has dyspepsy.

"But come to pie, I felt as though I couldn't! and lookye! I didn't! I eat a piece right against my conscience; facin' what I knew I ought to do, I went out and did what I ought not to. I tell ye my conscience made music for me considerable, and I said then I wouldn't never sneer at a drinkin' man no more, when he slipped up. I'd feel for him and help him, for I see how it was. So that day's practice gave out, but it learnt me a good deal more than I knew before.

"I started out next day to look up my Bible class. They haven't really tended up to Sunday-school as they ought, along back, but I was busy here and there; and there didn't seem to be a real chance to get to it.

"Well, 'twould take the evening to tell it all, but I found one real sick, been abed for three weeks, and was so glad to see me that I felt fairly 'shamed of myself. Seemed as though I heard the Lord for the first time sayin; "Inasmuch as ye did it not to one of the least of these, ye did it not unto me."

"Then another man's old mother says to me, before he came in from the shed, says she:

"He's been a-sayin' that if the folks' practiced what they preached, you'd ha come round to look him up afore now, but he reckoned you kinder looked down on the mill hands. I'm awful glad you come."

"Brethren, so was I. I tell you that day's work done me good. I got a good opinion of Joseph Emmons, now I tell ye, but I learned more about the Lord's ways than a month of Sundays ever showed me."

A smile he could not repress passed over Mr. Parke's earnest face. The deacon had forgotten all external issues in coming so close to the heart of things, but the smile passed away as he said:

"Brother Emmons do you remember what the Master said: 'If any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God or whether I speak of myself.'"

"Well, so it is," answered the deacon, "it's so right along. Why, I never thought so much of my Bible class nor took such interest in 'em as I do to-day—not since I begun to teach. I b'lieve they'll come more regular now, too.

"Now come fellowship day. I thought that would be all plain sailin'; seemed though I'd got warmed up till I felt pleasant towards every body; so I went around seein' folks that was neighbors, and t'was easy; but when I come home at noon spell, Philury says, says she—

"'Square Tucker's black bull is into the orchard a tearin' round, and he's knocked two lengths of fence flat!'

"Well, the old Adam riz up then, you'd better b'lieve. That black bull had been a breakin' into my lots ever since we got in th' aftermath, and it's Square Tucker's fence and he won't make it bull-strong as he oughter, and that orchard was a young one just comin' to bear, and all the new wood crisp cracklin's with frost. You'd better b'lieve I didn't have much feller-feeling with Amos Tucker. I jest put over to his house and spoke up pretty free to him, when he looked up and says, says he:

"Fellowship meetin day, ain't it, deacon?'

"I'd rather he'd a slapped my face, I felt as though I should like to slip behind the door. I see pretty distinct what sort of a life I'd be living all the years I'd been a professor, when I couldn't hold on to my tongue and temper one day!"

"Breth-e-rn," interrupted a slow, harsh voice, somewhat broken with emotion, "I'll tell the rest on't. He Josiah Emmons came around like a man an'a Christian right there. He asked me to forgive him, and not to think't was the fault of his religion, because't was his'n, and nothing else. I think more of him to-day than I ever done before. I was one that would'nt say I'd practice with the rest of ye I thought 'twas everlastin' nonsense—I'd rather go to forty-nine prayer meetings than work at bein' good a week. I believe my hope has been one of them that perish; it hain't worked, and I leave it behind to-day. I mean to begin honest, and it was seein, one honest Christian man that fetched me round to't."

Amos Tucker sat down and buried his grizzled head in his rough hands.

"Bless the Lord!" said the quivering tones of a still older man from a far corner of the house, and many a glistening eye gave silent response. "Go on, brother Emmons," said the minister.

"Well, when next day come I got up to make the fire, and my boy Joe had forgot the kindlin's. I'd opened my mouth to give him 'Jesse,' when it came over me suddin that this was the day of prayer for the family relation. I thought I would say nothin,' so I just fetched in my kindlin's myself, and when the fire had burnt up good I called my wife.

"Dear me," said she, "I've got such a headache, 'Siah, but I'll come in a minute." I didn't mind that, for women are always havin' headaches, and I was jest agoin' to say so, when I remembered the tex' about not bein' bitter against 'em, so I says, "Philury, you lay abed. I expect Emmie and me can get the vittles to-day. I declare she turned over and gave me sech a look; why it struck right in. There was my wife that had worked for an' waited on me twenty odd years, 'most scar't because I spoke kind of feelin' to her. I went and fetched in the pail o' water she'd always drawn herself, and then milked the cow. When I come in, Philury was up frying the potatoes, and the tears a shinin' on her white face. She didn't say nothin', she's kinder still, but she hadn't no need to. I felt a leetle meaner'n I did the day before, but 'twan't nothing to my condition when I was goin'; towards night, down the suller stairs for some apples, so's the children could have a roast, and I heerd Joe up in the kitchen sayin' to Emmy, "I do believe, Em, pa's goin' to die." "Why Josialy Emmons h w you talk!" "Well, I do; he's so everlastin' pleasant and good natured I can't but think he's struck with deth."

"I tell ye, brethren, I set right down on them sullen stairs and cried. I did, reely. Seemed as though the Lord had turned and looked at me, just as he did at Peter. Why, there was my own children never see me act real fatherly and pretty in all their lives. I'd growled and scolded and prayed at 'em, and tried to fetch 'em up just as the twig is bent the tree's inclined, ye know, but I had never thought they'd got right an reason to expect I'd do my part as well as they their'n. Seemed as though I was findin' out more about Josiah Emmon's shortcomings than was real agreeable.

"Come about Friday I got back to the store. I'd kind of left it to the boys the early part of the week, and things was a little cuttering, but I did have sense not to tear around and use sharp words as much as common. I began to think 'twas getting easy to practice after five days, when in come Judge Herrick's wife after some curlin' calico. I had a han'some piece, all done off with roses and things, but there was a fault in the weavin', every now and then, a thin streak. She didn't notice it, but she was pleased with the figures on't, and said she'd take the whole piece. Well, just as he was wrappin' of it up, that what Mr. Parkes here said about tryin' to act just as the Lord would in our place to come me. Why, I turned as red as a beet, I about knew I did. It made me all of a tremble. There was I, a doorkeeper in the tents of my God, as David says, really cheatin', and cheatin' a woman. I tell ye, brethrin, I was all a sweat. 'Mis' Herrick, says I, 'I don't believe you've looked real close at this goods; 'taint thorough wove," says I. So she didn't take it; but what fetched me was to think how many times before I had done such mean, onreliable little things to turn a penny, and then all the time sayin' and prayin' that I wanted to be like Christ. I kep' a trippin' of myself up all day jes in the ordinary business, and I was a peg lower down when night come than I was a Thursday. I'd rather, as far as hard work is concerned lay a mile of four-foot stone wall than undertake to do a man's livin' Christian duty twelve hours; and the heft of that is, it's because I ain't used to it, and I ought to be.

"So this mornin' come round, and I felt a mite more cheek. 'Twas missionary mornin', and seemed as if 'twas a sight easier to preach than to practice; I thought I'd begin to old Mis' Vedder's. So I put a testament in my pocket and knocked to her door. Says I, 'Good mornin', ma'am,' and then I stopped. Words seemed to stop somehow. I didn't want to pop right out that I'd come to try'n convert her folks. I hemmed and swallowed a little, and fin'lly I said, says I, 'We don't see you out to meetin' very frequent, Mis' Vedder.'

"'No, you don't!' ses she, as quick as a wink, 'I stay at home and mind my business.'

"'Well, we should like to hev you come along with us and do ye good,' says I, sort of conciliatory.

"'Look a here, deacon!' she snapped, 'I've lived alongside of you fifteen years, and you know I never went to meetin'; we ain't a pious lot, and you knowed it; we're poorer'n death and uglier'n sin. Jim he drinks and swears and Malviny don't know her letters. She knows a heap she hadn't ought to besides. Now what are you comin' here to-day for, I'd like to know, and talking so glib about meetin'? Go to meetin'! I'll go and come just when I darn please; for all you. Now get out o' this!' Why, she come at me with a broomstick. There wasn't no need on't; what she said was enough. I hadn't never asked her nor her'n to so much as think of goodness before. Then I went to another place just like that—I won't call no more names; and sure enough there was ten children in rags, the hull of 'em and the man half drunk. He give it to me, too; and I don't wonder. I'd said considerable about the heathen in foreign parts, and give some little for to convert 'em, and I had looked right over the heads of them that was next door. Seemed as if I could hear him say, 'These ye ought to have done, and not have left the other undone.' I couldn't face another soul to-day, my brethern; I come, and here I be. I have been searching through and through and found wantin'. God be merciful to me a sinner."—Examiner.

A FLESHY SPIRIT.

How a Professional Medium was Entrapped.

An amusing incident, by which a skeptic obtained considerably the best of a spiritualistic medium, to the great amusement of the audience, occurred at a public seance given recently by Mrs. Foye at Washington Hall, San Francisco. The demonstrations of the evening were to be by rappings on the table, names appearing to the medium written in the air, and writing on paper through inspiration. Those of the audience who desired to hear from a dead friend or relative were requested to write the name on a slip of paper, fold and place it in a hat passed around among the audience for that purpose. The medium explained that, of course, all could not get an answer that evening, but modestly suggested that they try again or call privately upon her and replenish her coffers. The idea occurred to a skeptical young man, who was one of the audience, that the medium would operate on only such papers as she glanced them over. It further occurred to him that by writing the name of some person now living and unknown to the medium, a fair test could be made of her to alleged powers. He, therefore, at once resolved to write his own name on a slip of paper and see what came of it. He printed it out in full—"FREMONT E. WOOD."—so that it would more readily catch the eye, and folded it but once, so that it would open in handling. The papers were then placed in a heap before the medium on a table and strict silence enjoined. Calling upon the spirits to aid her, Mrs. Foye began by lifting the papers, one by one, in her fingers, saying: "Is the spirit of this one present? This one? This one?" etc.

The audience, breathless with anticipation, awaited the result. Suddenly the medium paused, three raps being given on the table, which was understood to mean "Yes." Passing her hand over her eyes, as if to clear the vision of her intellect, and then staring dramatically into vacancy, Mrs Foye said:

"I see written in the air, the dim outline of the name Fremont Wood. Is there any one present who recognizes that name."

The flesh and blood of this restless spirit then arose and immediately all the eyes were bent upon him.

"Did you know this spirit when living?" asked Mrs, Foye.

"Yes; he was a personal friend," was the reply.

"You knew the age at which he died?"

"Yes."

"Please mention several ages, and among them the right one."

This was done and the information received by rappings that he died between the age of 23 and 24 years.

"Is that correct?" asked Mrs. Foye.

"No, madam," said the young skeptic, an expression of interest and amusement stealing over his countenance. "The spirit has made a slight mistake. If I know myself, Fremont Wood is not in spirit land, but here to-night in flesh and blood; in other words, I am that humble person."

The audience was electrified and gave vent to a round of hearty laughter. Mrs. Foye was considerably disconcerted and failed in several attempts during the rest of the evening. She insisted that such a spirit was present and that there was another person now dead who had the same name as that of Mr. Wood. The name Fremont is an uncommon one as a baptismal name that no one but himself, living or dead, has ever borne it in connection with the name of Wood.—San Francisco Chronicle.

CONDENSED NEWS.

Washington News Notes.

Senator Sewell has reported favorably the 31st from the committee on military affairs a bill which provides that no regimental or company officer shall hereafter be detached from duty with his regiment or company more than three years consecutively, and any officer heretofore or hereafter detailed, who shall be returned to duty with his company or regiment, shall not again be detailed except temporarily, and not then for a period of more than sixty days, until after the expiration of three years from his return to his company of regiment. The secretary of war and Gen. Sheridan oppose the provisions of the bill on the ground that they could not be carried out without great detriment to the service and because its exactment into law would so abridge the powers of the president, and those under him, as to seriously impair the administration of the army. Sheridan does not think it proper for congress to assume direction over what properly belongs to details of internal economy of the army.

Gen. Washburn gave a very pleasant dinner party at his house on the 1st inst. Among those present were the speaker and Mrs. Carlisle, the British minister and Mrs. West, the French minister, M. Roufton, Mr. and Mrs. Hiscock, Senator and Mrs. Miller of California, Gen. and Mrs. Sheridan, Gen. and Mrs. McFeeley, Senator and Mrs. Gibson, and Miss Washburn, daughter of ex-Gov. E. B. Washburn.

The speaker had some difficulty in making selections of members to serve on the Keifer-Boynton committee, because one of the parties is an ex speaker, and because both Boynton and Keifer are Republicans. This latter consideration may cause Mr. Carlisle to give the Republicans a majority representation on the committee.

The annual report of operations of the patent office for the calendar year shows an increase of 17 per cent. in the number of patents, trade marks and labels issued over the previous year. Cash receipts increased $137,000. Excess of receipts over expenditures, $300,000. Cash on hand, $2,676,476.

Doings of Criminals.

Particulars of the emeute at Sholsboro, Ala., the 26th inst., are that there had been a feud between one of the Wilburns and McCormack for some time, and the former proposed that they settle the matter at once, even at the cost of one of their lives. McCormack hesitated for a few moments, and at this juncture Cass Webb interfered, saying McCormack should not be imposed on and proposed to fight the other Wilburn Brothers, in order that McCormack should have fair play. Before an agreement was reached the Wilburn Brothers stepped back a few paces and drew their pistols. Webb proved too quick for them, and drawing his pistol, fired a bullet through Sam Wilburn's brain. McCormack, wild with fright, fled from the scene. Webb continued shooting, and killed another Wilburn and wounded the other, who died the 27th. Only one bullet struck Webb, inflicting a slight wound. He escaped, but a posse is in pursuit. The Wilburn family is one of the most aristocratic in the section in which the tragedy occurred.

Captious Secretary of the Navy.

Washington Special:—A few days ago Secretary Chandler made a requisition upon the civil service commission for nomination for a vacancy in the clerical force of the department; in response the commission certified to him the names of four persons from which to make a selection. This afternoon Chandler returned to the commission the nominations sent him, accompanied by a note, in which he stated that having carefully inspected the examination papers of the four persons whose names were certified he reached the conclusion that none of the candidates had, upon examination, showed sufficient intelligence to give promise of filling the vacancy in his department acceptably. This action of the secretary raises an interesting question. It has not yet been considered by the commissioners. Commissioner Thoman said that the persons whose names were certified to the secretary passed a fair examination before the commission, and in certifying them all the provisions of the law and civil service rules were fully complied with. In his judgment no other certificates of names would be made to the secretary under this requisition.

FORTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS.

Monday, January 28.

SENATE.—Senator Hoar reported to-day, from the committee on judiciary, an anti-polygamy bill, which embraces the principal features of the Edmunds bill introduced in the present session, and adds other provisions originating with the committee. He said that he did not himself favor that clause of the bill which requires the exclusion of women from suffrage in that territory.

HOUSE.—Immediately after the reading of the journal the death of E. W. Mackey of South Carolina, who died recently of peritonitis, was announced. The customary resolutions were adopted, and the house, as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, adjourned after appointing the following committee to take charge of the funeral arrangements: Messrs. Pettibone, O'Hara, Davis (Mo.), Hemphill, Bisbee and Willis.

Tuesday, January 29.

SENATE.—A bill repealing the timber culture law was reported favorably. Senator Cameron of Wisconsin introduced a bill to establish the Territory of North Dakota. Senator Sherman's resolution for an investigation of political murders in Virgini and Mississippi was adopted—33 to 29. Mr. Sherman contrary to general expectation, had a prepared speech on his resolution. It was calm and somewhat contemplative in tone. He read it shortly after 1 o clock.

"If," said the Ohio senator, in effect, "these things be as they are reported to have been, they ought to be investigated. The war has proven a failure if such things have happened and can be further countenanced in this country. We ought to know whether such matters are as they have been reported."

Mr. Mahone rose promptly when Mr. Sherman sat down. He had the printed slips of his speech in his hand. He was in good voice, and interested the galleries for three quarters of an hour. Bills were introduced abolishing the office of assistant surgeon general of the army; appropriating $200,000 for the improvement o the Missouri.

HOUSE.—The sensational part of proceedings in the house was the consideration and adoption of a resolution to investigate the charges made by ex-Speaker Keifer against Mr. H. V. Boynton, of the Cincinnati Commercial Gazette, to the effect that Mr. Boynton, toward the close of the last session of congress, had written to Speaker Keifer, asking him to recognize a member to move the passage of the notorious McGarrahan claim, and subsequently had approached him on the same subject.

Wednesday, January 30.

SENATE.—Mr. Blair presented a voluminous petition from about 4,000 citizens of the District of Columbia praying for the passage of a bill to prevent the manufacture or sale of alcoholic liquors within the District of Columbia and the territories. He expressed regret that no action had been taken upon former petitions of this kind, and thought the subject must eventually compel the attention of statesmen. The petition was referred to the committee on the District of Columbia, where it will slumber with its predecessors.

No business was transacted on account of the funeral of Mr. Mackey of the house.

The president sent the following nominations to the senate to-day:

Charles Roberts, register of the land office at Humboldt, Cal.; Richard S. Tuthill Chicago, United States attorney for the northern district of Illinois; James A. Connelly, Illinois, United States attorney for the southern district of Illinois.

Postmasters—James B. Budd, Houma, La; Niel Sinclair, Morgan City, La.; Carnot Bellinger, Luling, Tex.; James H. Ashcraft; Paducah, Ky.; Harry W. Grantley, Appleton City, Mo.; Lindell S. Keppler, Glendale, Mont.

HOUSE.—After the presentation and reference of several reports of committees, funeral services of the late Representative Mackey, of South Carolina, were observed and the house adjourned.

Friday, January 31.

SENATE.—The senate refused to concur in the conference report on the Greely relief bill, and a new committee was appointed. A bill was introduced to relieve commercial travelers from license taxes. The attorney general in a communication presented complained of an inadequate clerical force, and requested that the annual appropriation for the department of justice to be made at once. A resolution for an investigation of the cost of telegraphic correspondence was adopted. Adjourned till Monday.

HOUSE.—At the conclusion of the morning hour the house proceeded to the consideration of the calendar; precedence being given to bills reported from the committee on public lands. The first bill was that declaring forfeited certain grants of land made to aid in the construction of certain railroads. It forfeits all lands granted in Mississippi under the act approved Aug. 11, 1856, except grants in aid of a railroad from Jackson to the state line of Alabama. Also the lands granted in Alabama under the acts of June 3, 1856 and March 3, 1857, to aid in the construction of a road from Eylton to the Tennessee river, Memphis & Charleston road, and Savannah & Albany road; also the lands granted in Louisiana in aid of the construction of a road from New Orleans to the state line; also the lands granted in Arkansas in aid of the construction of a road from a point where the Iron Mountain road intersects the southern boundary to a point near Helena.

The next bill was that declaring forfeiture of the lands granted the Texas Pacific railway company under the act of congress approved March 3, 1871, and acts supplemental thereto. The report accompanying the bill being very long, it was ordered printed in the record, and without any debate the bill passed—Yeas, 250; nays, 1—Barr (Pa.)

Friday, February 1.

SENATE.—Not in session.

HOUSE.—After five days of debate, the house passed the bill for the relief of Fitz John Porter by a vote of 184 to 78. Strenuous efforts were resorted to by the opponents to stave off a vote by filibustering, but when at 5 o'clock those in favor conceded an hour for debate, the opponents of Porter accepted the situation. The beneficiary occupied a seat in the private gallery, and the eagerness as the climax approached were marked by the vast throng in the galleries, who had given up their dinner to witness the last scene. As the names of republicans were recorded in favor of the bill, they were applauded vigorously. There was considerable bluster and loud talking during the closing proceedings, but both sides were good-natured, as the result was a foregone conclusion before the roll call was half completed.

Messrs. Welford, Phelps, Laird, Henley, and Curtin spoke in favor of the bill, and Messrs. Calkins and Boutelle against it. All Minnesota members voted in the negative. Adjourned until the 5th inst.

Henry Jacobs, tailor, of Austin, has assigned to George E. Wilbur, assets, $2,000; liabilities, $3,500.

AN EXTRA SESSION UNWISE.

Gov. Hubbard's Reply to the Petitioners Who Want Grain Legislation—Better Take Time to Study the Best System of Reform.

REASONS OF THE EXECUTIVE.

STATE OF MINNESOTA, EXECUTIVE OFFICE, ST. PAUL, Jan. 25, 1884.—Elias Stienerson, Esq., Fisher, Polk County, Minn.—Dear Sir: Your name appears first in order upon the first of many petitions lately received, asking that the legislature of the state be called together in extra session, to consider the matter presented in regard to the grading, shipment and transportation of wheat. It is to you, therefore, that I address this reply, published for the information of all the signers, giving some of the reasons which lead me to the conclusion that it is not best to convene the legislature. I do not doubt that there exist grounds for complaint on the part of the growers of grain in a considerable part of the state against the prevailing rules and practices in grading, buying and transporting their products. I am not now for the first time convinced that there is danger that those who control the operations of great railroads, intent first and chiefly on subserving the interests of their stockholders by the economical and effective management of their gigantic agencies, would be found less prompt in observing that some of their rules were burdensome on the mass of the people, than that they were convenient and profitable to themselves and the small minority of the people who deal with them in large, frequent and easily regulated shipping contracts. Recent experiences have made it painfully evident that the uncertainties and variableness of grading impose frequent losses upon those who sell grain, and create a belief of losses, perhaps, more frequent and greater than actually exist. I believe that legislation can do much to remove just complaints on the ground of monopoly in buying, extortion in transportation, or inequality in grading; yet I doubt if the relief desired could best be obtained from the present legislature.

STATE INSPECTION.

In my message to that body one year ago, I earnestly recommended the adoption of "a system of state inspection which should comprehend the fixing of grades of grain, and the adoption of rules regulating the management of elevators and warehouses"; and, also, strongly urged upon its attention the necessity of some "legislative action imposing restraints upon the management of railroads." Both the branches of the legislature had both these questions before them. Bills were introduced for legislation similar to that which the petitioners now seek. They were considered by committees of both houses; both houses came to the conclusion that no action was advisable. A recall of this legislature to perfect such legislation might be interpreted to imply a censure of their former judgment, and possibly be regarded as an attempt at coercion of the legislative discretion by a co-ordinate branch of the government. But such is the condition of the finances of the state, owing to the extraordinary demands upon its treasury from the necessary rebuilding of its capitol and those parts of its hospitals for the insane and the reform school destroyed by fire, the expense of the extra session of 1881 and the impeachment trial following, that I doubt if I would be justified in imposing upon the taxpayers of the state the burden of the cost of an extra session of the legislature, even if these subjects had not already occupied the attention of that body. The evils complained of, though understood by the agriculturists of the whole state, are now most keenly felt only in portions, along certain lines of railway. Even there the damage will have been mostly done, the crop nearly marketed and the losses suffered before legislation could become effectual. A new house of representatives will be elected next November. It may be chosen if the electors please, with reference to these questions. It will convene with the senate the first of next January. To that legislature I shall assuredly recommend the enactment of laws that will secure at every station a market open and unrestricted; shipment and transportation for any and all without discrimination; and the establishment and maintenance within the state of a uniform and unchanging standard of grading. The intervening time will not be too long for those who may have the duty of legislation before them, to study the problems what to do and how to do it, and to direct public sentiment to an agreement upon a solution so reasonable and practical that no interest can hope to obstruct or evade it. Yours, very truly.

L. F. HUBBARD, Governor.

Minnesota Convicts Returned to Prison.

The convicts from Minneapolis and Winona were returned to Stillwater Friday the 1st, and Friday night all were locked up in their old quarters, with the exception of those confined in the county jail at the Stillwater court house. There are thirteen there, including the Younger brothers. They will be continued in their present place of confinement for a few days, as several of the cells are not yet in a proper condition. The four women will remain temporarily at Hastings. Dr. Pratt, the prison surgeon, made a thorough inspection of the cells, and pronounced them in excellent condition, warm and dry, and ready for occupation without the slightest danger to the health, even of the ill convicts.

Adj. Gen. McCarthy visited Stillwater, and finding that the cell building was ready for the reception of the convicts, issued general order No. 4, dismissing the troops from service at Stillwater. The men were ordered to return to their respective quarters, and the officers of each company to report through their commanding officer rosters of the men performing service at Stillwater, hours of duty and details for detached service. To the colonel commanding and the officers and men of Companies A, B, C, D, E, I and K was expressed the commander-in-chief's high appreciation of their services, and his commendation for their promptness and efficiency in the performance of the arduous duties entrusted upon them. The order was signed by the adjutant general, by command of the governor.

Senator Sabin exhibited his big-heartedness when he returned to Stillwater after the fire on the 26th, and found Assistant Warden Abe. Hall literally burned out of house and home. The Senator went at once to the poor fellow and said, "there is my house, take it and live in it, and use it as your own." Mr. Hall and his family are in the Sabin homestead, in comfort, when but for the senator's generosity they would be in distress.

A man giving his name as Carroll, but who is said to be named Hyland, stole a pair of sleds from G. S. Livesmore, at Fairmont, was captured by Sheriff Bird and locked up.

Considerable excitement was occasioned at Northfield when the report was circulated that Julia Cutts, an unmarried woman of questionable character and living with her parents, was on the 21st, delivered of a healthy boy baby, and which she would have killed at once but for the interferance of the attending physician, who saved the little fatherless infant from molestation. The child lived until the 23d, when it was reported that it had died from strangulation. It is believed by all familiar with the ways of the woman that this is a clear case of infanticide. The authorities will do their best to get the bottom facts of this case, and, if guilty, will prosecute to the full extent of the law.

The town of Arcadia is excited over a midnight attack on Miss Askcome, a teacher in the public schools. A hammer was thrown through the window of her bedroom, and when the door of the house was opened by the proprietor several pistol shots were fired at him, when the assailants fled. A number of letters have been sent to the principal of the school and directors threatening to kill Miss Askcome if she was not discharged. The only ground of objection named is that her father has been guilty of certain offences. Guards have been placed to prevent incendiarism.

Gorham Gilmore of Anoka received injuries which caused his death a few days ago while laboring in the lumber camp on William river in the northern part of the state.

HER CONQUEROR.

She was very beautiful and charming, with those large dark eyes soft with the melting tenderness of passion slumbering silently and dreamily—passion that would make them burn and glimmer with radiant glory at its first powerful awakening.

Small wonder that men whose pulses quivered at another's approach should quicken as she drew near: that hearts which beat so coolly and steadily year after year throbbed with a sudden undefinable feeling when she passed by. Wherever she moved, Ethel Burcome seemed to shed some subtle influence impregnating every masculine heart with its strange intoxicating magnetism. Wearied with the triumphs of the winter she had come to this little seaside retreat, to the home of a former schoolmate named Vernon.

"Here at least I can rest," she said one day as she lay swinging in the pretty hammock Mr. Vernon had fastened up between the rocks, within favorite shelter by the sea.

"I am not so sure of that," laughed Miss Vernon, glancing up from a rather shapeless mass of crewel work she was idly endeavoring to disentangle.

"Why so, dear Nell?" surely you wouldn't expect one to conform to the fashionable seaside custom of three toilets a day simply because that miserable brother of yours has threatened to visit us, and may drop down from the sky or the station any hour within the next twenty-four?"

"Ah, but I do, Ethel. I don't want to be ashamed of you. That old wrapper will do very well for Dick and myself, but would look horribly dowdy to welcome a visitor in."

"But what if I don't intend to welcome him—to see him, or have anything to do with him?"

"I can't see how you will avoid it, with such a contrary servant as I have now no three meals a day will be carried to anybody's room—of that I am certain. And unless Elliot will take his breakfast before you are up, his lunch in the pantry, and his dinner out of doors, I don't see how you can avoid meeting him at meal times, not to mention other hours of the day when you will be sure to stumble on each other."

The discussion grew so animated that the whistle of the afternoon train was unheeded. Ethel insisted on the necessity of packing up immediately; Mrs. Vernon as strongly insisted upon her remaining.

"Don't be foolish, dear; I was only joking. Probably Elliot is such a confirmed bachelor that he never gives a woman's toilet an instant's consideration now. He is not so formidable—only six feet two in his stockings. You needn't be so terribly alarmed at the thought of him, when the sight of him didn't trouble you very much once I fancy."

A faint flush came over the proud, handsome face; the eyelids drooped for very shame that the woman opposite, though her very best and sincerest friend, should know her secret. Years before they had met, but she imagined that few knew of that meeting. Eagerly, rashly, unconditionally he had surrendered, and Ethel—wrapped in dreams of conquest such as had never entered the head of a female Alexander disdained this easy victory, and cast the the vanquished from her.

Now he was coming of his own accord—as firm in his consciousness of power and strength as she had once been in hers; coming when he knew that the object of his first and only passion was an inmate of the home he had chosen for his summer abode. If he could thus venture undismayed into the presence of one who formerly wielded such a subtle spell over his love-dimmed senses, why did her heart—whose beatings hereto fore had never caused her the slightest loss of appetite, or a moment's sleep at midnight—commence to beat so tumultuously that she glanced timidly down to see if the snowy ruffles on her bosom were ever so lightly stirred by the newly-felt emotions within.

"If I go," she thought, "he will be vain enough to think I cared so much for him—repented of what I said—"

"Well," said Mrs. Vernon, giving up all hope of straightening out the obstinate crewel work, "you'll remain, I guess. You needn't dress for dinner if you don't choose to—do just exactly as you like—"

"You may be sure of that!" exclaimed the girl, in such a sharp, petulant tone that Mrs. Vernon, in the large amount of experience which she managed to accumulate during twenty years social conflict with the world, divined at once how the land laid.

She wisely restrained her inclination to torment her guest on the sudden change of position which the couple had suddenly assumed, and, taking Ethel's arm, slowly led the way to the house.

Mr. Vernon met them at the gate.

"I suppose you know Elliot's here?" he began.

"Why, no; when did he come?" asked Mrs. Vernon, feeling a very perceptible tremor creep along the arm on which her hand was still resting.

"Came on the three o'clock train—didn't you hear it? No fault of the whistle if you didn't. Blew loud enough to wake me out of the best nap I've had for I don't know how long."

"Where is he now?"

"Gone to the billiard room to have a smoke, and won't be down till dinner. Feels tired, he says. Well, we'll go up stairs too. Come, Ethel." At the door of her room Mrs. Vernon left her, and hurried on to her own.

Dinner time came. The newly arrived guest had exchanged greetings with her sister and taken his place at her right hand, and Mr. Vernon had long ago served the soup and fish, and the solitary servant was coming in with the chicken when Ethel entered, carelessly brushing back the heavy velvet portiere as she stepped over the threshold.

No longer in the wrapper of muslin and lace which she had hitherto been too indolent to lay aside for the evening meal, but radiant in dark crimson silk, lilies of the valley nestling in her golden hair,

The handsome face opposite lit up for one brief moment with a sudden gleam of involuntary admiration which Ethel's eyes were not quick enough to catch; then a voice rich, sonorous—strangely unlike the pleading accent of years ago—acknowledged her cool greeting with coolness and composure much more genuine than hers. Mrs. Vernon noted the extraordinary change in Ethel's attire, and was wicked enough to say: "I thought you were too tired to dress, dear; you usually are, you know."

Elliot, steadily looking across the table, saw the indignant glance which was the only answer Mrs. Vernon received, and smiled to himself as he raised the campagne to his lips.

"A little tamed, I fancy," was his thought, "but just as proud and unapproachable as ever."

Elliot Gray was a handsome man. His mirror said so, and the adulation of his female friends confirmed it. Yet he was very far from being vain, egotistical or shallowpated, as most handsome men are.

Left an orphan early in life, he had made the comfortable fortune which he then enjoyed, solely by his own shrewdness and exertions. He had once placed it at the disposal of the only woman he could ever endow with a wealth of love as well, and never in all these years had it been offered to another.

He was getting along in years, forty-two, according to the record in the old family Bible. Was it not just as well to drift along easily and contentedly as he had drifted up to now? He would go as usual to spend the summer months at his only sister's; no siren or enchantress, however dangerous, could frighten him from his customary visit to Sea Grove.

And now that he was there at last, sitting not ten feet from the subtle fascination of those great dark eyes, within sound of the sweetest voice that ever lured man to endless dreams of bliss, he felt a sudden, passionate emotion thrill his own veins; the blood which circulated so calmly and naturally now surged with such tremulous force that more than once a purple flush swept over his dark face.

How the dinner hour passed neither he nor Ethel ever had any very distinct recollection. He, too, felt very much inclined to fly. As they sat on the terrace that evening, and glancing at the small figure so near him whose golden head seemed bathed in a shining glory that moonlight alone can give, Elliot knew that—alas for him,—his heart was already willing—even eager to, return to its first captivity.

But no. Like Ethel, he would remain—remain to prove to her that her power over him was broken, that he could still listen and reply to that melodious voice without a quiver of his own.

"Don't you want to be made acquainted with our favorite retreat?" asked Mrs. Vernon the next morning as she was about to make her usual visit to the shore. "Ethel and I have chosen a very picturesque spot—we should be glad to have your approval of it, wouldn't we dear?" with an innocent look at that young lady.

"Many thanks," returned her brother dryly, "but I promised Dick I'd break that colt of his while he's here, and I think I'd better begin now."

A slight sneer curled Ethel's lips at these words. Perhaps a look of disappointment shone involuntarily in those dark eyes which Elliot must have caught as he turned away, for he paused as he was leaving the room and said:

"Well—if I shall not be in your way, and Miss Burcome is willing to permit an intruder—"

"But we might be in yours," retorted Ethel, interrupting him, "which would be unpleasant for all parties."

He did not say one word—did not look at her, but took his hat and followed Vernon out upon the terrace.

"Why did you begin by making an enemy of him?" asked Mrs. Vernon, when they were comfortably settled in their corner among the rocks, with the clear white sades at their feet, and the blue Atlantic rolling up to the beach beyond. "He was evidently inclined to forgive and forget, and here you commence raking up old scores again the very first thing!"

Yes, he had apparently forgotten—how it galled and wounded Ethel's heart when truth compelled her to make that acknowledgment! And her friend had also noticed his complete forgetfulness of every past incident which she in her pride fancied he would always remember—unpleasantly of course but still remember.

"Ethel!" exclaimed Mrs. Vernon, after carefully scrutinizing the downcast face for a few moments, "I really believe you are in love with him at last!"

"Sheerest nonsense!" returned Ethel sharply.

"Because I snapped him up so quickly—didn't want him to break in on our nice mornings by the sea, you think I—I'm in love with him."

Her voice grew very soft and gentle towards those last few words, something like a sob shook her breast and sent a tear unbidden to the eyes that looked steadily out to sea.

Mrs. Vernon considerately said nothing for a while, then changed the conversation; and it was not till they at last returned for luncheon that Elliot's name was again mentioned.

"I am a little worried about the colt," she observed meditatively.

"Is he going to die?" asked Ethel, in a careless, unsympathetic tone.

Mrs. Vernon laughed.

"No, Jerry is very far from being in a dying condition. I am expecting to find either Elliot or Dick with a broken neck, or something of that sort."

"Is he so very vicious then?" said the other, more interestedly, Mrs. Vernon even imagined there was a tinge of anxiety in her voice.

"Yes, he is unusually so."

"Then I hope nothing has happened to—to Dick, or—or to—" she stopped.

"The colt?" said her hostess, provokingly. "I hope not. You are very kind to show so much interest in either. Dick will appreciate it, but, alas! Jerry cannot."

The days passed away all in like manner. But two weeks from the date of Elliot's arrival he was standing on the lawn just in front of the doorway, idly switching the heads from the numerous daisies in the pathway. Ethel, coming from one of the long windows that opened on the porch, unexpectedly found herself alone with him. He looked up with a pleased smile on his ordinarily grave face. Ethel paused, and said, with evident embarrassment:

"I thought Nell would be waiting for me here."

"So she will be in a moment. She went around to the stable to see the new greyhound. Sit down, won't you? I am not such poor company that a few moments will be thought wasted with me—am I?" and he drew up a garden chair for her.

There was nothing to do but to accept it. She glanced down the narrow path. Mrs. Vernon was not visible, so she gave herself up to the pleasure and charm of the moment.

"What do you do with yourself every day?" he asked. "Isn't it rather lonesome, after the life and vivacity of the city?"

"O no," she replied eagerly. "I like it very much. You've never seen our seaport town, as Nell calls it, or you would not think life could be monotonous in the midst of such wild, natural beauty."

"I wanted to accompany you one morning, but you cruelly intimated that my society was not acceptable, and so—and so I've not had sufficient courage to ask again."

"I think you would get permission if you should," she said, so softly, however, that he bent down to catch the words.

Mrs. Vernon appearing then, this confidential conversation ceased, but Elliot so unhesitatingly declared his intention of accompanying them that she could not help showing her amazement, and looked inquiringly at Ethel as if for explanation of this unusual hardihood on his part.

But Ethel's impassive face gave no sign. Elliot came to her rescue.

"I am forcing myself on you, it appears, but I am determined to find out the source of Miss Burcome's continual amusement in this dull place."

"You are complimentary to Dick and myself, I must say."

"My dear sister, you are entirely innocent of having furnished me with one particle of amusement. I am wholly indebted to Dick and——"

"The colt," added his sister laughing.

"I'm not so sure of that. He gave me an ugly kick on the shoulder yesterday and I'm not over the effects of it yet."

Ethel's face expressed volumes of sympathy, but she could not trust herself to speak.

"And you never mentioned it before!" exclaimed Mrs. Vernon. "Too bad! I shall persuade Dick to sell it—such a vicious creature it has grown to be."

The summer passed pleasantly and quietly. Elliot was constant in his visits to the rocks, sometimes in company with Ethel and his sister, but latterly to be found with the former alone. For Mrs. Vernon discovering that household matters—which had never caused much anxiety before—were going on the best they might under the sole direction of an incompetent servant, took numberless opportunities of remaining at home, thus throwing her two visitors constantly together.

But there was no change in his manner. If Ethel hoped that he was desirous of returning to his former state of hopeless love for her, he certainly gave her no reason to to indulge in such expectations. He was a pleasant, agreeable—even at times vivacious companion, but far from degenerating into the lover. Her pride was sorely wounded and there were occasions when some fittish remark showed it more plainly than she was aware.

She even tried the ball-room ruse of fixing the day of her departure, and telling him of it only the morning before. They were standing on the terrace, he about to pay the first visit he had made in several weeks to the refractory colt.

"O indeed! Nell will be so disappointed, for she thought you might be induced to remain till October," was his cool rejoinder. Not one word of his disappointment!

So Ethel, thoroughly annoyed by his apparent indifference, hastily made all preparations for her departure on the morrow. That afternoon was devoted to a few calls on friends who lived a mile or two above them on the beach. She did not return till dinner, and then walked straight into the dining-room, arrayed in her calling costume.

Vernon, unusually so punctual at meal time, was not in his place, Mrs. Vernon's chair was also vacant.

"Well," said Ethel to herself, "they have often blamed me for keeping them waiting. I shall not be so foolish as to let them keep me."

Ringing the bell, she asked for some soup, and was answered by a stony stare of surprise from the servant. "Is there any particular reason why I should not enjoy my dinner now?" asked Ethel, condescending to try the effect of a sarcastic tone upon the big, bony Irish girl.

"Yis, to be sure if yer appetite's good whin there's death in the house."

Death? How Ethel started at that word! Poor Dick, certainly. Nell always said Jerry would be the death of him. Eat? Of course not, when her friend was in such trouble.

Hastily rising, she made her way to the library and was met at the door by Mrs. Vernon, coming out.

"O Nell, what is the matter? Is he—is he—oh, poor Dick! I'm so sorry I went out this afternoon—"

"Dick?" interrupted Mrs. Vernon in an aggrieved tone. "Well, it isn't Dick—its Elliot. Shoulder broken or smashed or something by that miserable beast, and—and I don't know how much besides. Dick's gone for the Doctor and I'm for a poultice," and she swept past, leaving Ethel standing bewildered, with her hand on the knob of the door. Should she go in?

What would he think if she did not hasten to offer her friendly sympathy?

A burning flush arose to her face as this last question forced itself upon her, and she half turned away. Then came a sudden, overpowering emotion, painful, yet masterful. Tears of loving sympathy sprang to her eyes, and once more she laid her hand upon the door.

For the second time she felt her courage rapidly oozing away, and she probably would have yielded to her first fear had not a faint moan from within decided her. He was suffering—yes, she would go.

Slowly the door rolled back. Finally a small figure stole almost stealthily across the now darkened room, over to the lounge near the window.

One hand shaded his face, the other, crushed and broken, was wrapped in a soft, silk handkerchief.

"Back so soon, Nell?" he asked, without raising his hand from his eyes. A little trembling hand touched his feverish forehead, and a voice—Oh, so sweet and gentle, announced:

"Nell has not returned yet. I—I came to—to tell you—to say how sorry I feel you are injured so—and—and—"

"You are very kind," he answered, feebly, "but there is not so much the matter. How did you know? Did Nell tell you?"

She did not reply.

Elliot turned his head—so near, so very near to hers—and saw a tear falling on her fair, flushed cheek. Raising himself as best he could, he stretched out his arm and drew her silently to his breast.

"O, Ethel—oh, my darling, did you come freely—willingly, or was it sympathy such as only an ordinary friend might offer? Tell me."

"I—I came—" the clear voice faltered but for her own peace of mind the confession must come—"I came because—I could not stay away from you."

"But you will leave me to-morrow he could not help asking, enjoying his turn the sweetness of a triumph.

Down went Ethel on her knees side the lounge. Humbly, repentant her tearful eyes looking into his.

"Oh, Elliot, I must stay with you."

"For how long, dear?"

The German Army.

The greatest numerical strength o German army in the late war France never exceeded 1,400,000 but a writer in a recent number o Fortnightly Review declares that future war half a million more so could be sent into the field. He mates that Germany can almost i iately mobilize an army of 38,00 cers, 1,450,000 men, 27,000 phy and officials, and 300,000 horse which number all clothes, arma outfits, carts, etc., are provided in time, and held in readiness in the ent garrisons. To the mobilized would have to be added the surplu drilled reserve and militiamen numl ing 150,000 men; the depot reserve the first class, numbering 550,000 m one contingent of recruits, one-year v unteers, Volunteers under twenty y and ten contingents of Landst which makes up a grand total of 2, 000 trained men, commanded by offi who have fought some of the gre battles of the century, and have ne turned their backs upon the enemy.

Indignation Meeting.

On Wednesday afternoon a telegram was received from Washington, announcing that Mr. T. B. Walker was in that city using all the means at his command to prevent the passage of Mr. Nelson's bill for opening the Red Lake Indian Reservation. Hand bills were at once struck off at this office calling an indignation meeting at city hall at 7:30. Promptly at the hour the hall began to fill with the leading citizens. The meeting was organized by electing Judge Reynolds chairman and John N. Ives and H. E. Cooke secretaries. Many speeches were made condemning Mr. Walker's action in this matter and commending Mr. Nelson's course. The following resolutions were introduced by the Hon. H. Steenerson and unanimously adopted and signed by every person in the audience, viz:

WHEREAS the bill introduced in Congress of the United States by the Hon. Knute Nelson, (H. R. No. 846) for the cession and opening of the Red Lake Indian Reservation in the State of Minnesota, which has been approved by the Hon. Secretary of the Interior, and favorably reported by the committee on Indian Affairs of the House of Representatives is, in the judgment of the citizens of Crookston and vicinity, of the greatest importance to the development and prosperity of Northern Minnesota and to the benefit, welfare and civilization of said tribe of Indians, and

WHEREAS.—It is credibly reported that Mr. T. B. Walker, and other pine land owners of this State, from selfish motives are in Washington lobbying against the passage of said bill, and

WHEREAS.—No public interest can or will be subserved or promoted by the opposition or defeat of said bill, and

WHEREAS.—Opposition to said bill, is in our judgment, prompted solely by private and selfish interest, having for its object to secure for the longest possible period to a few capitalists, interested in lumbering operations an unlimited monopoly of all pine stumpage available and naturally tributary to Northern Minnesota and Dakota, now therefore it is hereby

Resolved.—By the citizens of Crookston, Minnesota, and vicinity, in public meeting assembled that we condemn in the most emphatic terms such opposition to said bill and that in our opinion such opposition is caused by and proceeds from, the most selfish and avaricious motives, and is directly opposed to the welfare of said tribe of Indians and thousands of honest and industrious home seekers, settlers ready and willing to occupy and till the unused agricultural acres of said reservation as will tend to the prosperity and development of Northern Minnesota and Dakota in general and be it further

Resolved.—That Mr. T. B. Walker is most respectfully but urgently invited to desist from and discontinue all opposition to the passage of said bill and be it further

Resolved.—That we tender our thanks to the Hon. Knute Nelson for his faithful services to his constituents already performed and that, to the wisdom and practical statesmanship of Congress and the Executive we most implicitly confide the success of said measure, and that a copy of these resolutions expressive of our sentiments on said subject, be forwarded to each of our senators and representatives in Congress.

John Leo, John Cromb and John N. Ives were appointed a committee to communicate with every town and city in the Northwest who are interested in the success of the Nelson bill and urge them to take immediate action. Moved that a copy of these proceedings be furnished the St. Paul Pioneer Press, the Globe and other leading newspapers of the Northwest with a request for publication. Carried. After further discussion adjourned.

Resolutions Adopted by the Farmers Convention January 29, 1884.

From the Grand Forks Herald.

We, the farmers and business men of the Red River Valley, in convention assembled, do declare as follows our views upon the great questions that have occasioned our assemblage to-day.

We are opposed to the present system as adopted by the millers' association of Minneapolis, and of the management of the St. P., M. & M. R. R. in allowing the said millers' association in monopolizing the wheat business of the Red River Valley.

That all we desire is a fair grade for our wheat, and the price it is worth, and that it may be shipped at reasonable rates.

The buyers from Eastern markets may be allowed to enter this market from which they are now virtually debarred by the present system of railway transfers.

We would recommend the appointment of a committee by this convention, composed of ten delegates of representative farmers and business men, whose duties will be to visit the management of the St. P., M. & M. R. R., in St. Paul, and to place before that company the views of this convention.

First—To endeavor to secure the privilege of shipping grain through to Milwaukee or Chicago without breaking bulk.

Second—Allowing responsible parties to erect elevators along their line of railroad, of not less than (15,000,) fifteen thousand bushels capacity.

Third—Endeavor, if possible, to secure a reduction of the present rates of traffic, and to submit such other grievances as may suggest itself to them.

Also, That if this committee can make such arrangements with said company by which our No. 1 hard wheat, or such grades as may be shipped from the Valley, can be delivered in the Milwaukee or Chicago markets without the necessity of breaking bulk, causing a mixture of grades at St. Paul or Minneapolis.

That the limited facilities for transporting the great product of the Red River Valley has tended to advance the interests of monopolies, oppressing the hard working and deserving producer and enriching the speculating few who have control of the avenues leading to the great distributing marts of the east, that by reason thereof, communities are oppressed; the growth of municipalities having all the resources that make prosperous cities, is stunted; and the progress of a great commonwealth seriously retarded; emancipation from such evils is in an enlarged, ample and competing system of traffic and transportation, free from the dominion of the few, and governed by the approved and recognized laws of legitimate trade, and a moral support such as a system subserving the interest of all people will bring to its aid:

Third—That, though experiencing all the evils of the system we denounce, and suffering under its oppression, yet it is our sense of justice and a determination to obtain it, that awakens us to an activity in the direction of a reform; that our prosperity in the past, and our abiding hope and assured prospects for the future are a sufficient guarranty of our ability to work out a result that would secure to our people the benefits that we are entitled to.

The rich resources of our country, its wealth, growth financially, the thrifty condition of our people, are ample assurances of the success of any enterprise for increased railroad transportation, and markets for the products of our soil, and we freely pledge our strength as a people for the fostering and promotion of any well approved undertaking in that direction.

That this committee so appointed shall be instructed and authorised to visit Milwaukee and Chicago and confer with the authorities in such cities, who have control of the grain business, and to secure their co-operation in our interests by sending buyers among us in competition with said Minneapolis millers' association.

That we further recommend that this convention take such steps for the purpose of raising funds to defray the necessary expenses of the committee.

The Immediate Result.

Grand Forks Herald.

Judged by the criteria of numbers and enthusiasm the convention of farmers and others just held in Grand Forks was an admirable success. What the ultimate sequence may be, only time can tell, but it is safe to predicate of its work several important advantages at this early day, one being the high character as an organized force which must be assigned to them as a class even by their opponents in this controversy. United and with a determined purpose to crush their oppressors, the farmers no longer remain the pliant drudges of whom it can only be said they "feed the world," but they present the intelligent and irresistible power which in some way, though as yet undefined, will break the shackles of monopoly. Added to the earnestness and business energy which characterized their action, firmly impressed with the actuality and general prevalence of the wrongs whereof they complain they yet exhibited a degree of tolerance and desire for fairness, in admitting the exparte statement of one of their oppressors, on the same basis as the regularly approved affidavits of the aggrieved, that must have been surprising to all disinterested spectators. The really important factors evolved by the convention, to lead to the ultimate disenthrallment of the people of the Northwest from the jaws of corporate rapacity, were first, the moulding of a united sentiment in favor of an outlet for our products to a foreign market by the natural course of the Red River and Hudson bay, on the strength of the information imparted by the delegates from Winnipeg and a consequent knitting of interest between Dakota and Manitoba in a fight by mutuality of interests, and the practical prayer to Congress for aid in the shape of improvement of the Red River, our natural outlet. Second, a general pledge of aid and encouragement to any competing line of railway from the South, or toward the North that may take advantage of the situation, and grasp the opportunity to secure the transportation of our immense wealth in wheat and other products; third, the provision of a central commercial and agricultural union, with branches in every township of the Northwest, so that, at any time, the whole mass of farmers may move for their benefit, with a united potency that no corporation or association of shylocks can resist. Of the proposed pilgrimage to St. Paul to petition the railway company to please quit fostering a monopoly which it has contracted to foster and may be interested in mantaining, it may be said in the trite and amiable criticism: "If it does no good, it will do no harm." We must not consider it a hook on which to hang any appreciable weight of hopes. The solid work of the convention is limned above. Now, let it not be assumed that the results desired are achieved. As one of our correspondents so forcibly and graphically showed, the farmers of the Northwest have learned the lesson of self-reliance. It has been a painful struggle with most of them to keep the life-blood warm in the veins and arteries of trade, not to mention their own personal privations. Self-reliance has brought them hither; by it alone can the grand work be carried on. And let it be done intelligently, harmoniously, despite all attempts by schemers, to mislead for paltry purposes. Read, work, organize!

With the compliments of Jas. B. Power, Esq., we have received the railroad company's immigration pamphlet, entitled "The Red River Valley, the land of Golden Grain." It contains many fine illustrations and much interesting matter concerning our country. Mr. Power informs us that the inquiries for information concerning this country were never greater than now, as many as 140 letters a day being sometimes received, the aggregate being 890 letters for the past ten days. He will talk to over 100,000 farmers, through their pamphlet within the next 90 days and he predicts a grand rush to the valley this spring, a great many coming with plenty of capital to open and cultivate good farms. The fact that we have one of the best countries in the world can not be denied nor does any one who has ever seen it wish to deny it and if we can only secure an open market for our wheat our future is secured; it will be grand and glorious.

ADDRESS.

of the Directors of the G. F., C. & L. S. R. R. Company.

TO THE VOTERS OF POLK COUNTY.

The Grand Forks, Crookston and Lake Superior Railroad Company is incorporated for the purpose of constructing a main line of railroad, from the east bank of the Red River, opposite the city of Grand Forks by the way of Crookston to the head of Lake Superior or to a point of connection with some other road constructed, and in operation, to the head of said lake, with a branch on the south from a point on said main line in, or east of, range 44, through Norman County, to mouth of the Wild Rice River, and another branch on the south from Crookston or some point west of Crookston to the south-west corner of Polk County; and also a branch on the north from a point in, or east of range 44, by way of Red Lake Falls to the east bank of Red River at or north of the mouth of the mouth of Turtle River in Dakota. The company have filed with the County Auditor a proposition, asking the aid of Polk County, in the construction of said road and branches, by the issue of the bonds of the county in the sum of $200,000 to be delivered to the company when the main line is completed, and the branch to the south west corner of the county is graded, provided both be done within three years. No interest to be paid on the bonds until the road is so completed. An election has been called to be held in each election precinct on Tuesday, the 19th of February. In order that you may vote intelligently, we submit the following facts and figures for your consideration: First, You need the road. There is no other possible escape from the iron grip of the threefold monopoly that now appropriates every cent of the profits of your toil. You have now nothing to say as to where your wheat shall go, or who shall have it, or how it shall be graded, or by what line of transportation it shall be carried off. You do not sell your crop for "it takes two to make a bargain." You are simply told to bring that wheat and pour it into this hopper, and when we have taken out what we want for handling it—for transporting in—and milling it—you can have the balance if any thing is left. Two hundred thousand dollars may look to you like a large sum of money, and so it is, but it is not more than you are losing every year on your wheat crop—you raise each year 2,000,000 bushels of wheat and it is a moderate estimate to say you have not received for it as much by ten cents per bushel, as you should have received or would have received with a competing railroad—competing elevators and competing buyers and ten cent per bushel on 2,000,000 bushels is $200,000. You are not required to give to this company $200,000, but only the interest on that sum at the rate of six per cent. per annum or $12,000 per year for twenty or thirty years. The assessed valuation last year was $4,744,000. in 1882 it was $2,809,000 in 1881 $2,914,000, in 1880 $1,663,000, in 1879 $663,000 or in four years it has increased over four millions and at the same rate of increase the assessment list of the county will be nearly $7,000,000 before any tax can be levied for interest on those bonds and if it was only $6,000,000 your taxes to pay the interest on these bonds would be only two mills on the dollar of your taxable property or two dollars on a thousand. An average farmer with 160 acres all under cultivation with necessary teams and tools pays taxes on about $2,000 and his tax in 1885 would be four dollars, which would be reduced each year thereafter as the grand list is increased so that in six years when the list will be increased $12,000,000 his tax would be two dollars per year and if left at that amount—two dollars per year it would keep up the interest on the bonds and raise a sinking fund sufficient to pay the principal before it became due.

It is safe to say that a farmer who pays taxes on $2,000 raises for sale 1,000 bushels of wheat and if another railroad—another market—and the competition in buying and handling should only raise the price of his wheat one cent per bushel it would be ten dollars, or twice and a half his tax to pay the interest on the bonds. But it would most certainly add ten cents per bushel to the price he would get without this competition, which would be $100 on 1,000 bushels of wheat. Again such competition would give us cheaper freights on all the goods and machinery shipped into the country. This main line of road will run through twenty or thirty miles of solid pine timber that would be manufactured in the woods and shipped to this market at a price not exceeding the price in Minneapolis or Duluth—a saving on lumber equal to the cost of shipment from these points. Bear in mind that unless the road is built within three years the bonds are not to be delivered, and the county is not bound to pay either principal or interest, but the bonds will be destroyed. The company does not expect to be three years in building the road but expects to build it as fast as money and men can do it, but the three years condition in the proposition is to cover possible but unexpected hindrances. With the county bonds we ask you to vote us, and an equal or greater amount which we can raise in cash by the sale of stock, to expend in grading and surveying, we confidently expect to be able to borrow on the bonds and mortgage of the company sufficient to build and equip the main line within eighteen months from this date.

Bearing in mind that "the gods help those who help themselves," please turn out on the 19th inst. and deposit your ballot "For the railroad proposition."

Respectfully,

FOR THE BOARD OF DIRECTORS.

Elsewhere will be found an account of the business transacted by the farmers at their meeting on Saturday last. A constitution and by laws was adopted and an organization will be effected on Wednesday Feb. 13th it is hoped. The millers, who are interested in getting our No. 1 Hard wheat at the very lowest figure possible will use money plentifully to that end and if the farmers hope to successfully cope with them they must organize and create a fund to be used in self defense. Acting as individuals the farmers are powerless but in unison they might become a power for good. Acting individually it would take thousands of dollars to accomplish what a few hundreds will accomplish if judiciously and intelligently expended with the weight of public opinion to back it. We expect this question will have to come before the next legislature for settlement and we should be prepared with [illegible] and the means if need be to send a number of live men to lobby in the interests of the wheat raisers and business men of the Northwest. The proposition is simple enough to be readily understood by all, as it is simply this, that we must either get relief or quit raising wheat. It is earnestly hoped that a large attendance will be at Fortier's Hall on Wednesday Feb. 13th.

Farm Notes.

The Best Way.

Farmers' Tribune.

It seems from our standpoint, that the best way for the farmers in the Northwest is to market pretty much all they raise by making their products into beef, mutton and pork. We do not know that this could be so in regard to the surplus wheat, but it could with the corn, oats, barley and root products. At the agricultural meeting the other day in St. Paul, a prominent farmer informed us that he had for the past few years disposed of all of his productions on the farm in this manner, and he found it to be very profitable. After shearing time, he would purchase a flock of sheep and by keeping them in a good pasture, they were in good condition when the winter set in, but by feeding them on roots and corn meal, with plenty of good hay, they would be fat by March, and he always could sell them to the butchers at that season of the year and in April, for a very large price. In this way his grain and root crops brought him in a good deal more than they did when he was obliged to cart them to market. He usually contracts his mutton on the foot for $6 per 100 pounds. In the spring of the year good fat mutton is always scarce, and the demand for meat of this superior quality is very great. So, too, with beef. Good stall-fed beef in March or April should always bring at least $5 per 100 on the hoof. When the grain is made into beef the return comes into the farmer's hands in a big lump. It saves all the care and perplexities and fluctuations of the market, as well as all the vexations and bother of the grades. When disposed of in this manner, little does the producer care whether his grain grades No. 1 or No. 2. It saves the farmer, too, all the trouble and work of hauling his grain to market, the expense of which is very considerable, particularly if his farm is some distance from a depot or a railroad market, for there are few good markets off of a railroad.

More Farm Horses.

That is just what the farmers of the Northwest want at this time—more farm horses. It appears to us the best and cheapest way they can get them, is to start in and raise them on the farm. It won't do to buy them, they are too high in price for that. By judicious management they can get along two or three years. A good many colts have been raised during the last season, and a good many more will be next year. The fact is, we must no pay out so much money to the old settled states for horses. Thousands are brought into the Northwest every year, and as a result thousands and thousands of dollars are paid for them. This money should be saved, and it could be if farmers would give more attention to the breeding of horses. No matter how large or small the farm may be, the owners of every one of them should raise every year at least a span of good colts. If this course could be adopted the supply of horses demanded for the trade would be filled at home. As it is now, Illinois, Missouri, Indiana and other states have that honor, as well as the profits of the trade. The annual breaking up of so much prairie, has caused a great demand for farm teams. Not near all the prairie is occupied yet by settlers, and the demand for horse flesh will, for the next few years, be greater than ever. Let our own farmers be prepared to meet it, and keep the money at home. That will be found to be the best way.

The Farmers' Walks.

Some one has taken the trouble to find out, says the Orange County Farmer, how far a farmer must walk to put in and tend forty acres of corn. The conclusion is as follows:

To plow the ground with a 18-inch three-horse plow, he travels 350 miles; to harrow the ground thoroughly before planting, he will have to travel 100 miles; to mark out the same he travels 50 miles; to cultivate it afterwards, he will have to travel 800 miles—making a grand total of 860 miles, besides the gathering.

Cisterns on the Farm.

Unless a farmer has plenty of water near his stables, and even then, he should build large cisterns for the purpose of watering his stock at certain seasons of the year. A running brook, a lake or creek is convenient, but not more so than a good, large cistern. In all instances, where there is not running or standing water handy to the barnyard, farmers have sunk wells, and in this state they answer a good purpose. Windmills of such a superior character are constructed so cheap that when one is attached to a well for pumping purposes, it makes the well almost equal to a brook, or a lake, but a large cistern can now be built with little expense, and will be found very convenient. It is demonstrated that neither stone or brick is necessary to build them, all that is required after the dirt or earth is removed, is to apply the cement right on the wall of the excavation. It will be found to be much better than to stone or brick it up. A cistern made in this way large enough to float a large ship would cost but a few dollars. Those having [illegible]

Fargo Republican: The farmers of the country are awakening to their interests. The day in which they would calmly submit to the extortion of monopolies has gone by, and its place has come the determination to submit no longer, but to assert their rights and with their might defend them.

THE NORTHWEST'S INTEREST IN THE FARMER.

Pioneer Press.

The issues raised between the farmers, the millers' association and the railroad companies have hitherto been considered, as a rule, in their most urgent aspect, which is that of personal differences between the parties concerned. In a cool and dispassionate way it has seemed proper to discuss the failures of adjustment and the unfortunate results they entail much as if the parties were plaintiff and defendant in a suit where no other interests were involved. The merits of the case on this ground having been pretty well canvassed, and the existence of substantial reasons for dissatisfaction revealed, it is now in good part to inquire whether there is no wider view of the subject; whether the demand of justice for the farmer on grounds of abstract right is not to be reinforced by arguments which touch every man in the community, and which affect all interests in the Northwest to an extent too little understood or appreciated. Does not this question of farmers' rights permeate every department of industry and business, and act and react upon the forces which are at work in giving coherence, shape and direction to the future of this new Northwest? It will appear upon a little investigation that this is not a mere granger issue upon which outsiders may look with indifference, taking one side or the other, or none, as their preferences suggest; but a question which comes home direct to every man whose interests hinge upon the progress and permanency of Northwestern development.

In election times there is any amount of eloquence wasted in stump speeches about the position and value of the farmer in the state. A great deal of this humbug, and still more of it pure cant; but the fact remains that the agricultural industry is the foundation upon which all others rest, and by whose prosperity or adversity they are immediately and sensibly affected. A year of failing crops is a year of depression and distress. A year of abundant yield is a year of flush times and plenty of ready money to oil the wheels of manufacture and trade. As the application of labor to the soil is the primary source from which all wealth is derived, so does all industry move rapidly or slowly according as these springs gush forth freely and abundantly or flow with feeble and intermittent motion. Any cause which disastrously affects the farming interests is to the state what a diet insufficient in quantity and inferior in quality is to the individual. The practical effect and application of these laws is even now being felt. The condition of the farming interest is so critical that it is not a wise policy to attempt to ignore it. The complaints that have been advanced in such abundance and with such earnestness are not the mere mutterings of malcontents, but the representations of men who have been sobered by being brought face to face with probable ruin. It is the testimony of those who have examined carefully the condition of the farmer of Northern Minnesota and Dakota that they are in worse plight to-day than ever before except in a season of complete failure. Abundant crops abroad and the lowering of price consequent upon diminished demand brought about inevitably a decrease of receipts to the farmer, which reduced his profits to the bare margin of living expenses, or below it. In this condition the dockage of a certain percentage on his crop, the lowering of a grade, the imposition of any unexpected burden, might make the difference between independence and debt; might determine whether he should continue to attempt to force success from his industry or abandon it in despair. What may be said about the real or the imaginary nature of his grievances, his actual condition is a thing that will bear inquiring into; and such an inquiry raises a grave question for the future.

The farmer is not making money. He is not preparing a comfortable home for himself and a modest inheritance for his children. He is not laying aside something for the seasons of failure that he must expect. On the contrary, he is and has been running behind, until he finds himself to-day, in a large number of cases, heavily burdened with debt; without a prospect of future emancipation; at the mercy of those whose natural disposition it is to make him contribute all that they can get from him to their profits; without comfort in the present or hope for the future. This is not a country or a people where such a condition of things can continue to exist indefinitely. It is the simple truth that infinite ruin will be wrought to the farming interest and the multitudes of other interests dependent upon it, unless something be done to remedy this state of things. At present wheat farming does not pay. Those engaged in it still trust that relief will come in a few years. If it does not, they make no secret of their intention to abandon a losing business; choosing rather to sacrifice the labor of the past than to put their whole future in pledge. It has been asserted that the number of mortgages placed on farms was never so great, or the total amount of indebtedness so heavy, as it is now. Struggling forward from year to year, only able to make both ends meet in favorable seasons, and running behind whenever nature is unkind, the man who sought the Northwest to make himself independent is having a sorry time of it. He has had faith that development of the country would remove his worst difficulties, but he cannot hold out much longer. It is significant that a gentleman who represents a capital of many thousands of dollars invested in wheat raising in the Northwest, who has therefore been able to pay for improvements in cash and avoid interest charges, who has been strong enough to compel as fair treatment as any producer receives, declares that if some change is not made the enterprise will be given up in a few years. Capital and labor do not continue offering themselves forever without a recompense. This is the plain statement of a prominent representative of the farming interest. If such be the condition of those who can command at least as much justice as is dealt out to others, it is not hard to imagine the situation of the poor farmer who has, perhaps, incurred obligations in order to enabled him to raise his first crop, who has steadily fought a losing battle with his finances, and who is forced to accept the grades and the transportation rates that are offered him. If the reports that are current have any semblance of truth, the number of those who are ready to sell out their holdings at a loss, to leave the improvements which their labor has established, and to tempt elsewhere a kinder fate, is no inconsiderable portion of the whole people engaged in wheat farming. It is in the strong contrast between this presentation of the situation and the bountiful prosperity which ought to rule everywhere throughout the Northwest that the moral of the present agitation lies. It has been demonstrated that here is the favored region for the production of the cereals which are the main support of man. It has been more than proved by experience that in this virile climate new vigor animates the human frame, and new purpose strengthens will and endeavor. Every condition is favorable to the existence here of prosperous development such as the past has seen and the present justifies. There is health in the air and wealth in the soil for millions upon millions of contented people, plentifully supplied for every emergency by the products of their own unforced industry. It must indeed be an artificial interruption by some cruel and external cause which can put a check upon the marvelous and healthy growth that nature has ordained as the prerogative of the generous Northwest.

It should not be necessary to point out the effect of this upon the community at large. Without crediting half that is said, it is evident enough that the depressed condition of the farmers is seriously affecting every other industry in the Northwest, not least those which are charged with making at present undue profits out of the farmers themselves. The man who is at odds with fate in an endeavor to provide for the bare needs of his family is not in a condition to purchase largely of even the necessaries of life. As a consequence, there is a slackening of trade which even the present condition of business in the East does not justify in this longitude, and the hardship of the farmer is transferred to all those classes with whom the farmer has to do. As far as complaint is directed against freight charges, the same rule of self-interest ought to apply to secure their moderation. A railroad is not built and operated at a profit for the one purpose of carrying wheat to market. There must be return freights, local trade and a general development of the profitable interchange of products which constitutes commerce. And thus we return to the general principle of the interdependence of interests, which should unite with the appetite for profit the willingness to live and let live. Such a consideration must work to a more general and thoughtful study of the difficulties exhibited in the situation of the farmers. The present is no mere voice of grumbling, covetousness. It is a cry of genuine distress, and it portends mischief in relations where no one can suffer without affecting all the rest. The farmer's troubles are a reality, and they threaten the whole community of which he is a part. If the Northwest is to achieve the future which it has set before it, and which is easily within reach, it cannot view the situation with an eye of indifference; it cannot fail to consider gravely and calmly the present situation, and to apply the corrective to an evil imperiling all our interests—social, material and political.

Duluth News: Polk County wishes to bond herself $200,000 for a railroad to Duluth. Let Duluth do her share and let the D. & W. be up and stirring or some other bird will get a very good sized worm. It is probable that Grand Forks and other northwestern counties will help in building an independent road. Farmers in that section are bound hand and foot and say they might as well quit farming as work as they have been for the Millers' Association. The Northwest is ripe for direct communication with us and all [illegible]

To the Voters of Polk County, Greeting:

We submit some further considerations in favor of your voting "For the railroad proposition."

The building of this road will in the next two years put in circulation in this county not less than one million dollars. There will be graded during the season of 1884, within the county, not less than one hundred miles of road bed on the main line and branch, which will cost $100,000, such work as the farmers and laborers of the county can do more profitably than any parties from abroad, for they are at home with their teams and feed and tools. Then comes the cutting and hauling of ties in the winter following; then the laying of track in the spring and summer of 1885. The main line and branch to the south-west corner of the county will cost at least $2,250,000, and fully sixty per cent, of this cost goes into labor. The road traverses miles of pine timber that will be worked every winter for years to come, and shipped over this road, and giving perpetual winter work for the farmers of this county at which farmers will make more clear money than they can make in a thousand years at wheat farming for the benefit of the Minneapolis Millers' association, the elevator companies and the St. P., M. & M. R'y. Co.

The general offices of this company are at the city of Crookston, where its contracts will be let and its money paid out thus putting all its money in to the arteries of circulation in the center of your county by directors and officers of this company.

The control of all railroad companies is in its board of directors and a majority of the board of this company are residents of Polk County and the balance of them residents of Grand Forks, whose interests are identical with your own and as in all probability the stock of the company will be mostly taken in the two places, you are sure to have a road controlled in your own interest and as the issue of the bonds of the county will entitle the county to $200,000 of the stock of the company, the county will be the largest stock holder and be able to hold control of the board of directors and of the road.

I suppose none of you doubt but such a road would pay, from the day of its completion and if it pays but moderately well, the stock owned by the county would be worth par, and would pay both the interest and principal of the bonds in which case the county would have secured the building of the road with all its advantages by simply loaning its credit to the company without cost to itself.

But even if the stock was worth nothing and the $200,000 was a clear gift to the company the expense to the taxpayers could not in any event exceed two dollars on a thousand for the first six years after 1885 and one dollar on a thousand after that, for the balance of the twenty years when this rate of taxation will have paid the bonds in full; and this certainly would be no burden to any one.

You have been complaining of the injustice and swindling practiced upon you by the monopolies that have robbed you for several years past—we know your complaints to be well founded. you have made yourselves heard and the agents of these monopolies have been among you and told you that you have been fairly dealt by and your complaints were groundless—they have returned to St. Paul and Minneapolis and reported through their paid organs that you were making a great fuss about nothing and coolly advise you to work harder—farm better and live cheaper—thus adding insult to injury.

We have given you credit for honesty in your complaints—and for intelligence enough to know that a competing road, a competing market and competing buyers was the only possible relief for you—and this relief is now offered you at a cost so trifling, and on terms so fair that we expect you to accept our proposition by an overwhelming vote on the 19th of the present month and we promise you as speedily as money and men can accomplish it a direct outlet to the head of Lake Superior by a line of road under your own control.

If you are satisfied with your present condition, vote "against the railroad proposition;" if not, then vote "for the railroad proposition."

We await your answer at the polls.

For the Board of Directors,

G. F. C. & L. S. R. R. Co.

ST. PAUL, Feb. 6th, 1884.

EDITOR POLK COUNTY JOURNAL.

DEAR SIR:—I telegraphed you this morning as follows, "Duluth & Winnipeg Railroad Company will soon submit proposition to Polk County. This being direct outlet to Duluth has more merit than Grand Forks and Crookston project. You will forward best interests of valley by favoring former company." My reasons for so doing are, I feel a deep interest in the future welfare and prosperity of the Red River Valley, the first settlement of which I was so intimately connected with. I understand through private letters, newspaper talk etc., that the citizens of different points in the valley have organized a railroad company called the "Grand Forks, Crookston & Lake Superior Railroad Company" which has made a proposition to the voters of Polk County to issue bonds to the amount of $200,000 in favor of said company to be paid to it upon the grading and tieing of a road bed from East Grand Forks to some point on the eastern boundry of the county, with various branches and from this last named point to the southwestern corner of the county provided said work shall be done within three years.

Now, what the people want is an INDEPENDENT ROAD DIRECT FROM DULUTH and this company do not propose to furnish that outlet only indirectly through the help of some other railroad company no guarantee of which is given to the people of the valley. Even if this company should succed in making arrangements with some other company and thereby gain an eastern outlet to the lake, it will be via Brainerd and the Northern Pacific, which is not what the farmers want, as the distance on this route would be less than 40 miles shorter than by the roads already built via Glyndon, and they would still have two companies to contend with the same as now and the relief sought by the farmers of Polk County would not be obtained, as a combination of this kind would not lessen the tariff on wheat or facilitate the getting of cars in which to ship it.

If the county should issue these bonds according to the proposition made to it, of course it would not have them to pay unless the work was done according to agreement; but in voting the tax they thereby tie their hands for three years, so they could not aid any logitimate road that might, with a little aid be induced to build an independent road direct from Duluth.

The Duluth and Winnipeg Railroad Company have already commenced such a road, but was forced to stop work after having expended from $250,000 to $300,000. Since then negotiations for money to complete the road have been commenced with capitalists on both sides of the ocean and are now pending with fair prospects of success; and with a little local encouragement there is little doubt but that this road will be built as far west as Crookston and Grand Forks before November, 1885.

If the voters of Polk County understood this matter thoroughly, they would display the good sense they possess by defeating the issuing of any bonds to any company which there is not a fair prospect will give them both a speedy and direct road to Duluth.

Lest any one should think that I am paid for writing this, I will state that neither of the companies above named have ever given me, or promised to give me, a dollar. I have written solely because of the interest I feel in that country and being entirely on the outside am enabled to see this matter in a clearer light and with less prejudice than those directly interested. Hoping and trusting that my many friends in Polk County will weigh the subject well before casting their vote in this matter, I am,

Very truly yours,

F. H. SHAW.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Feb. 4, 1884.

E. D. Childs, Carman, Minn.

DEAR SIR: Your letter came to-day and I have only a few moments time to write you to-night, but will say that it will be very unfortunate for Crookston if the bonus of $200,000 should be voted for a railroad. A road is needed to Duluth and will be built in the near future. The bonus will largely go into the pockets of the men who handle the scheme, as it has in every instance in the past history of railroad schemes of this kind. This project will profit Grand Forks at least ten times as much as it will Crookston and yet they are asked for only one-third as much as Polk County. If Crookston is to prosper they must not adopt such measures as this. Grand Forks, as the terminus, will derive considerable advantage, as their trade is mostly on the west side. It will sprent the trade of Crookston to several small towns, both east and west of the city. But I have not time to go into details. The scheme will harm Crookston and help Grand Forks. Crookston must depend largely for her growth and prosperity upon manufacturing. The city or county might to much better advantage spend one hundred thousand dollars in building up the Reynold's Slough Water Power and another hundred thousand in establishing manufactories on it. The first flush of good times is likely to build the road; it is being worked at now all the time by three different sets of men outside of your region, and this bonus would not likely hurry it but little, if any. Very truly,

T. B. WALKER.

We find the following noble letter in the Toledo Blade and as it bears the the initials of Mr. V. D. Carruth's oldest son we presume Lynn wrote it and we give it to his many friends in this city and vicinity as an evidence that Lynn is doing well in that far-away country and is exerting an influence for good:

PASQUE, NORTHWESTERN TER.,
Jan. 26th, 1884.

I see you are endeavoring to convince your readers that "Prohibition is Prohibition." I will give you the proof this Territory affords. The Northwestern Territory is under strict laws prohibiting liquor in all forms, even in essences such as vanilla, lemon and others, used for flavoring. It can be obtained for medicinal purposes by first getting a permit from the Governor, and then in no larger quantity than three gallons, generally one, and one must be well recommended to get the permit. The Territory has 500 mounted police who do duty as soldiers against Indians, as Constables and Detectives, but their principal duty is now to keep liquor out of the country, and they do it. As a result, there is no crime to speak of. The Canadian Pacific Railway has built a thousand miles of line and done it quicker than any road ever did, simply because they had sober men, and had no dance houses and whisky tents right along with the front, as was the case with all the other Pacific railways. There is not much for people to do here as yet to make a living, and there are as many settlers as there are in countries where there is more and where the climate is not so rigorous, but we hear of no murders, robberies, and other crimes, as we do where the whisky shop takes all the poor settler's cash and sets him crazy beside. Every one is clothed and in his right mind, no one staggers, people do not have to hang a pair of six-shooters in their belts, as they do in most countries as new as this. And all these advantges are from the lack of such a blessing as whisky is to the devil. Yours, hoping to help.

L. S. CARRUTH, Ag't C. P. Railway.

The Schoolmaster of our Republic.

"When our republic rose, Noah Webster became its schoolmasters. There had never been a great nation with a universal language without dialects. The Yorkshireman can not now talk with a man from Cornwall. The peasant of the Ligurian Appennines, drives his goats home at evening, over hills that look down on six provinces, none of whose dialects he can speak. Here, five thousand miles change not the sound of a word. Around every fireside, and from every tribune, in every field of labor and every factory of toil, is heard the same tongue. We owe it to Noah Webster's Spelling Book and Dictionaries. He has done for us more than Alfred did for England, or Cadmus for Greece. His books have educated three generations. They are forever multiplying his innumerable army of thinkers, who will transmit his name from age to age. Only two men have stood on the New World, whose fame is so sure to last—Columbus, its discoverer, and Washington, its saviour. Webster is and will be its great teacher; and these three make our trinity of fame.

Red River Valley Farmers and Others.

At a convention of farmers of Clay County, held at Moorhead on the 9th inst., it was voted to call a mass convention of farmers, business men, and all citizens interested, in the Red River Valley in Minnesota and Dakota, to meet at Moorhead, on the 19th, 20th and 21st of February, to consider ways and means of advancing the interests of the people in dealing with railroad, elevator, or other forms of corporate monopoly. The matter of preventing the mixture of Red River Valley hard wheat with the interior grades grown in less favored sections of the State and Territory, and of securing to our farmers the price which their superior grain entitles them to, will receive prominent attention. Prof. C. L. Whitney, General Deputy of the Minnesota State Grange and ex-lecturer of the Michigan State Grange, and others, will be present as speakers. The local committee of arrangements are Lyman Loring, R. M. Probstfield, Alonzo Wilson, Moorhead; Leon D. Brown, A. M. Burdick A. E. Hall, Glyndon.

MORTGAGE SALE.

DEFAULT HAVING BEEN MADE IN THE payment of the sum of five hundred and twenty-eight and forty-nine one hundredths dollars, ($528 49-100.) which is claimed to be due at the date of this notice, upon a certain mortgage duly executed and delivered by Carrie Dewey and Alvah Dewey her husband to E. D. Childs bearing date the 14th day of June A. D. 1883, and, with a power of sale therein contained, duly recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds in and for the County of Polk, and State of Minnesota, on the 19th day of June A. D. 1883, at 2 o'clock p. m., in book "R" of mortgages, on page 60, to secure the payment of a certain promissory note for the sum of five hundred dollars payable September 14th, 1883, with interest at the rate of ten per cent. per annum until paid, and duly executed and delivered by said Carrie Dewey and Alvah Dewey her husband, and no action or proceeding having been instituted, at law or otherwise, to recover the debt secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof, or the interest thereof.

Now therefore, notice is hereby given, that by virtue of the power of sale contained in said mortgage, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the premises described in and conveyed by said mortgage, viz: Lots eight and nine (8 and 9) in block five (5) and the east half of lot twenty-two (22) in block two (2) [illegible] situate in the village of [illegible], according to the original plat thereof on file in the office of the Register of Deeds, in and for said Polk County, and State of Minnesota, with the hereditaments and appurtenances; which sale will be made by the sheriff of said Polk County, at the front door of the Court House, in the city of Crookston, in said County and State, on the 29th day of March A. D. 1884, at ten o'clock a. m., of that day, at public vendue, to the highest bidder for cash, to pay said debt and interest, and the taxes, if any, on said premises, and twenty-five dollars attorney's fees as stipulated in and by said mortgage in case of foreclosure, and the disbursements allowed by law; subject to redemption at any time within one year from the day of sale, as provided by law.

Dated February 7th, A. D. 1884.

MORTGAGE SALE.

DEFAULT HAVING BEEN MADE IN THE payment of the sum of two hundred and thirty-seven dollars, ($237.00,) which is claimed to be due at the date of this notice upon a certain mortgage, duly executed and delivered by Gideon Drosier a single man, to Charles H. Minor, of Racine, Wisconsin, bearing date the 30th day of March, A. D. 1882, and, with a power of sale therein contained, duly recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds in and for the County of Polk and State of Minnesota, on the 30th day of March A. D. 1882, at 4 o'clock p. m. in book "F" of mortgages, on pages 298 and 299, in the sum of two hundred dollars, to secure the payment of one certain promissory note for said sum of two hundred dollars, payable on the 30th day of March 1885, with interest thereon at the rate of ten per cent. per annum payable on the first day of January of each year until paid, and containing a clause that if default be made in the payment of any interest, or any portion thereof for the space of ten days after the same becomes payable, then all said principal and interest, shall at the option of the holder thereof become immediately due and payable, without further notice, and whereas two installments of interest amounting to thirty-seven dollars has been due and payable for more than ten days, and no action or proceeding having been instituted, at law or otherwise, to recover the debt secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof or said installments of interest.

Now therefore, notice is hereby given, that by virtue of the power of sale contained in said mortgage, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the premises described in and conveyed by said mortgage, viz; The northeast quarter (ne¼) of Section No. twenty-two (22,) in Township No. one hundred and fifty-one (151,) north, of Range No. forty-six (46) west, of the 5 P. M., containing one hundred and sixty acres more or less, according to the United States Government survey thereof and situated in Polk County and State of Minnesota, with the hereditaments and appurtenances; which sale will be made by the Sheriff of said Polk County, at the front door of the Court House in the City of Crookston, in the said County and State, on the 6th day of March A. D. 1884, at ten o'clock a. m., of that day, at public vendue, to the highest bidder for cash, to pay said debt and interest, and the taxes, if any, on said premises, and twenty-five dollars attorney's fees as stipulated in and by said mortgage in case of foreclosure, and the disbursements allowed by law; subject to redemption at any time within one year from the day of sale, as provided by law.

[First insertion Jan. 10th, 1883.]

Notice of Mortgage Foreclosure Sale.

DEFAULT HAS OCCURRED IN THE CONditions of a certain mortgage made, executed and delivered by Knud Knudsen and Kate D. Knudsen, his wife, mortgagers, to Elwood S. Corser, mortgagee, which said mortgage bears date the fourteenth day of April, A. D. 1882, and was recorded on the seventeenth day of April A. D. 1882, in the office of the Register of Deeds of Polk County, in the State of Minnesota, in book "I" of mortgages on page 31. No action has been instituted at law to recover the amount secured by said mortgage.

There is claimed to be due thereon and is actually due on said mortgage at the date of this notice, the sum of five hundred dollars ($500) with interest from the fifteenth day of February, A. D. 1883, at the rate of ten (10) per cent. per annum.

The premises set forth in and conveyed by said mortgage are situated in the County of Polk in the State of Minnesota, and are as follows, to-wit: Lot seven (7) in block fourteen (14) in the village of Carman, according to the recorded plat thereof.

The said mortgage contains a full power of sale in due form of law, in case of default of payment of the said principal or interest in said mortgage specified, or any part thereof, when due. Said mortgage also contains a stipulation on the part of the said mortgager to pay the sum of ten dollars ($10) as and for attorney's fees for the foreclosure thereof.

Whereas, default has been made in the payment of the principal sum and interest due on said mortgage, and said power of sale has become operative.

Now, therefore, notice is hereby given that by reason of said default and by virtue of the power of sale in said mortgage contained, and pursuant to the statutes in such case made and provided, the said above described mortgaged premises will be sold at public auction at the front door of the Court House, in the city of Crookston, in the County of Polk and State of Minnesota, on Saturday, the first day of March, A. D. 1884, at ten o'clock a. m. to satisfy the amount then due on said mortgage, together also with ten dollars ($10) stipulated by said mortgagors to be paid as attorney fees, and including also such costs as are allowed by law.

Dated this seventh day of January, 1884.

Public Auction Sale.

Notice is hereby given that we, the undersigned will at the Livery Stables of Terry & Collins, on the corner of Main and Fourth Street, in the city of Crookston, County of Polk, and State of Minnesota, at the front door of said stable, on said Main Street, on Saturday the first day of March A. D. 1884, at the hour of ten o'clock in the forenoon of said day, at public sale, sell the following described personal property, belonging to John B. Fillatrault, to-wit: One large grey mule about eight or nine years old, to satisfy our claim, for labor bestowed upon, and food and stabling furnished to said mule at the request of said Fillatrault on the twenty-fourth day of October A. D. 1883, who was then and now is the sole owner of said described personal property and in whose legal possession the said mule was prior to said twenty-fourth day of October A. D. 1883, and until delivered to us for the keeping and care thereof by said Fillatrault on said last named day. That the amount of our said claim herein is the sum of forty-six dollars, at the date of this notice, and that said personal property will at the time and place above named be sold at public vendue to the highest bidder therefor for cash at the time of such sale, to satisfy our said claim, and also the costs and expenses attending the said sale, and the keeping of said property until said day of sale.

STATE OF MINNESOTA, County of Polk, } ss. District Court, Eleventh Judicial District.

Notice is hereby given that by virtue of an execution to me directed and delivered and now in my hands, issued out of the District Court of the Eleventh Judicial District, State of Minnesota, County of Polk, upon a judgment rendered in said Court in favor Between Ernest Buse, plaintiff, and Mary E. Bottineau, and John B. Bottineau, defendants, in favor of said Ernest Buse.

I have levied upon the following described lands situated in the County of Polk and State of Minnesota, to-wit: One undivided one-third (⅓) of lots eight (8) nine (9) ten (10) eleven (11) and twelve (12) of Section fifteen (15); also the northwest quarter of Section twenty-two (22) and lots two (2) and eight (8) of Section fourteen (14) and lots three (3) four (4) five (5) six (6) and thirteen (13) in Section fifteen (15); also the southwest quarter of the southeast quarter and the north half of the southeast quarter of Section twenty-two, (22) and the northwest quarter of the southwest quarter of Section twenty-three, (23) all in township one hundred and fifty-one (151) north, of range forty-four (44) west; and lots seven (7) eight (8) nine (9) ten (10) eleven (11) in Section twenty-six (26) Township one hundred and fifty-one (151) north, of range forty-five (45) west; also lots five (5) six (6) seven (7) eight (8) nine (9) ten (10) eleven (11) and twelve (12) in Section eighteen (18); also lots one (1) two (2) three (3) six (6) and twelve (12), and the southwest quarter of the northeast quarter, and lots eight (8) nine (9) ten (10) eleven (11), and the southwest quarter of the southwest quarter of Section eight (8); also lots three (3) four (4) five (5) six (6) seven (7) and eight (8) of Section four, (4) Township one hundred and fifty (150) north, of Range forty-five (45) west, containing in the whole of said tract fourteen hundred and forty (1,440) acres, more or less, according to the government survey.

And that I shall, on Wednesday, the ninth (9th) day of April, A. D. 1884, at the hour of ten o'clock a. m. of said day, at the front door of the Court House in said County and State proceed to sell all the right, title and interest of the above-named Mary E. Bottineau and John B. Bottineau in and to the above described property to satisfy said judgment and costs amounting to nine hundred and fifty-three 28-100 dollars ($953 28-100) together with all accruing costs of sale and interest on the same from January 25th, 1884, at the rate of one (1) per cent. per annum, at public auction to the highest bidder for cash.

Prof. Dusso singing class will meet next Monday Evening at Lawerence Hall.

Service Sunday February 17th at 1 o'clock in the Norwegian Lutheran church by Rev. A. O. Anderson.

Grand Forks County will petition Congress for the opportunity to vote bonds in favor of the G. F. C., & L. S. R. R.

No. 1 Hard wheat seems to be lodged in the 79 notch. It has been going up in the east but that seems to make no difference in our market.

A National Educational Association will be held at Madison, Wis., next summer commencing on Tuesday July 15th lasting four days.

Mrs. Copeland, with her children accompanied conductor J. B. on his trip to Devils Lake on Saturday last, spending the Sabbath at that place.

O. H. Myran and P. L. Ramstad were in from Ada this week. They realize the importance of the G. F. C., & L. S R. R. line to this country and wish they had a chance to vote for it.

The St. Paul Globe has put in a new Webb perfecting press and now has facilties equal to any newspaper in the United States. The Globe is a rattling good paper for news and market reports but its politices are way off color—being Democratic.

The entertainment given by Sophus Lindner, at the M. E. church last Saturday night was poorly attended but was a fine entertainment. Probably the reason that there were but few out was because it had been very poorly advertised beforehand.

Superintendent V. D. Carruth has secured another teachers institute, to be held in Crookston, commencing on Monday, August 25th and continuing during the week. The Prof, has shown commendable zeal in his attention to the schools of our county and is very evidently the right man in the right place.

Latest reports from St. Paul indicate that the Grand Forks committee have accomplished a good work. President Hill, of the Manitoba road virtually concedes all of their requests and will allow the erection of small elevators, will reduce the tariff on wheat and lumber and the road will adopt a policy for the future which if fully carried out can not fail to give us what we have all been longing for—an open wheat market.

We received a letter on the bond question last evening, signed "A Tax payer," which for two reasons we are unable to present to our readers. In the first place the writer violates one of the well-known rules of every printing office by omitting to give his name and in the second place the Commissioners report received this morning gave us all the extra work we could attend to and make our publication.

The committee which the convention at Grand Forks elected to go to confer with the railroad authorities have returned, and while they do not bring any assurance of anything definite having been accomplished, we think good will result from it. They interviewed Mr. Manvel, who seems disposed to aid the farmers, and Mr. Hill gave them a sleigh ride out to his farm to see his blooded stock and get a good dinner after which Mr. Hill listened to their grievances and did not say definitely (as far as we can learn) what steps the company will take to remedy existing evils.

Some of the oppesers of the G. F. C., & L. S. R. R. bonds say as a reason why the bonds should be defeated next Tuesday that a railroad through the big pine woods would induce the building of saw mills there and thus injure the trade of Crookston saw mills! This is the narrowest argument we have heard advanced, just as if the natural advantages of Crookston could not take care of her trade! We are of the opinion that a railroad through the big pine would do that very thing as far as furnishing cherp pine is concerned and that is one of the benefits that the farmer hopes to, and will, derive from it, and a strong argument why all farmers should vote for the bonds. As far as the trade of Crookston is concerned, if farmers did not have to pay such outrageous prices for the few boards they have to buy, they would have more money to trade in Crookston with than they now have. It is all such narrow-contracted, petty local jealousies as these that are the main dependence of the opposers of the bonds. Let the voters ponder well before they decide to kill such a friend as the G. F. C. & L. S. R. R. will be to them if built.

Don't fail to see Pinafore on Monday evening next.

There will be a basket sociable at the Congregational church on Friday evening. All ladies who are willing to help a worthy cause will please provide themselves with baskets of lunch for two, each marked with the owner's name. A pleasant gathering is expected.

THE FARMERS' MEETING

Was called to order at 3 p. m. In the absence of the regular chairman, Mr. M. R. Brown, Mr. F. T. Haseltine was elected chairman, pro tem. The constitution and by-laws, as printed in these columns last week, were read by the chairman, and a motion made to adopt them, which motion, after a lengthy discussion, was adopted. The following farmers and business men signed the constitution and by-laws, viz:

	Acres.	P. O. Address
F. T. Haseltine...	150	Crookston.
H. E. Cooke,......	500	"
E. D. Childs.....	3000	Carman.
C. Hanson.......	135	Crookston.
Andrew Sture......	100	Red Lake Falls.
Chris. Houston....	130	Crookston.
Martin Jensen....	120	"
M. B, Hayes.......		"
R. E. Smith....,		Carman.
E. A. Bradish.....	200	Fisher
J. M. Swanson.....		Red Lake Falls.
L. Freeman.......	520	Fisher.
Knute Nelson.....		Aidal.
A. D. Stephens....		Fisher.
J. P. Marcum....	160	Crookston.
M. E. Bartlett.....	120	Fairfax.

As each members fees are one cent per acre for every acre cultivated, or one dollar if he cultivates no land it will be seen that the above list creates a fund of over seventy dollars to start with. On motion volunteers were called for to circulate the constitution and by-laws for signatures. On motion it was decided to postpone the election of offers until the next meeting in two week. On motion adjourned until Wednesday, Feb. 27th. 1884.

The art loan exhibition at the Congregational church has surpassed the expectations of even these most interested, in being a handsome display of things curious and beautiful. Those who attend will be well repaid. Admission, afternoon 15 cents, evening 25 cents, concert Saturday evening 35 cents.

Pinafore.

The Ada Pinafore Company will present this pleasing and popular opera at Ericsson's Hall on Monday evening Feb. 18th. Speaking of this company the Ada Index says: For the first time our people will have an opportunity of witnessing here at home, what they have so long heard of, dreamed of, wondered about, and desired to see. The play of Pinafore is running over with excellent dramatic work, sparkling songs, and grand choruses, these augmented by original Pinafore scenery showing harbor view of Portsmouth, (Eng.) with its variety of shipping. The deck of the good ship Pinafore with its crew of sailors marines, etc. Elegant costumes, well trained voices and orchestra combined produce an entertainment of very unusual interest. The full effect of these attractions will be brought out by the company who have been under strict and careful training by Mr. J. W Blanchard, from the New England conservatory of music. A rare treat is in store for all lovers of fun and good music.

Notice.

I wish to announce to the public that I am prepared to sustain all I have stated previously in the columns of the Chronicle or JOURNAL, in regard to the Crookston Nurseries, and I do not deem it any credit to F. T. Haseltine to state that I have misrepresented in this matter, until he is prepared to prove his assersions. Furthermore, it is not just and right for said F. T. because he is a little older and cranky enough to advertise himself as proprietor of my property without giving compensation for said claim. As well he promised (in presence of a witness) before the division was made in June, 1882, owning that he would not buy my interest in our business or sell his own to me, to advertise in his own name and treat me as a friend nursery man, which you all can see has not been the case. I wish to ask the public why F. T. made purchase of land from the R. R. Co. at a somewhat reduced rate in the summer of 1881, (as they wished to encourage our business) and consign same over to himself or friends; as well as to renew the lease on the old nursery ground in his own name in the fall of 1882, if it were not to defraud his partner out of five or six hundred dollars in the rise of real estate and expense of moving my stock to a new point for a nursery. Thanking the public for their attention and patronage, I remain.

Most Respectfully.
E. W. HASELTINE.

STATE OF MINNESOTA, County of Polk, } ss. In Probate Court.

In the matter of the estate of Alexander Grant, deceased:

On reading and filing the petition of W. D. Raymond, of Polk County, Minnesota, representing among other things, that Alexander Grant, late of Polk County, Minnesota, on the 10th day of February, 1884, at the city of Crookston, in said county, died intestate, and being a resident of this county at the time of his death, leaving goods, chattels and estate within this county, and that the said petitioner is a friend of said deceased, and praying that administration of said estate be to W. D. Raymond, granted.

It is ordered that said petition be heard before the Judge of this Court, on Wednesday, the 5th day of March, 1884, at 10 o'clock a. m., at the Probate Office in Crookston, in said county.

Ordered further, that notice thereof be given to the heirs of said deceased, and to all persons interested, by publishing a copy of this order for three successive weeks prior to said day of hearing, in the POLK COUNTY JOURNAL, a weekly newspaper printed and published at the city of Crookston, in said county.

Farmer's Scraps.

A man who agrees to pay a dollar and a half for an article at the end of the year, when he can get it for a dollar by paying cash down, is very likely to die in the poor house, and he ought to.

As, in summer, wooden implements soon spoil in rain and sun; so in winter, they are often cracked and warped inviting speedy rot and dissolution, by being left exposed to frost and moisture. Over-hauling, cleaning, oiling or painting, and storing ready for future effective use is a job that will afford substantial satisfaction, and so make a wet or stormy day seem actually a pleasant one.

Professor Cook says light Brahmas have proved even better layers in Winter than his brown Leghorns; their eggs are finer in quality, larger and of rich color.

A New Jersey farmer writes that he gave a dressing of salt (eight bushels to the acre) to land badly infested with white grubs, and for three years after raised good crops of corn, which was impossible previous to this application.

The Augusta (Ga.) Chronicle boasts that it runs no agriculture column: that it employs "no veteran journalist, with hay seed in his hair and pepper-pods on his coat, to write up in thrilling numbers the "thoughts for the month on farm work in this season.' " But, occasionally, the Chronicle has an article on "How best to blow up big gourds," or "the best fertilizer for a crop of sugar-cured hams," &c., that, it just thinks, knocks the spots off any common information on these topics. Its recent leading editorial takes the ground that sleet is a No. 1 top-dressing for a wheat field.

The simple plan of storing eggs in dry ashes has been used for some time by a correspondent of the Live Stock Journal with satisfactory results. Though rather fastidious about their quality, he reports having enjoyed those thus kept during a period of four months, and in one instance a whole year. The only precautions seem to be (besides, of course, sound eggs to begin with) "to see that the ashes are quite dry and to see that the eggs do not touch one another."

Kerry cows, says the Rural New Yorker, are the race of Irish cattle, which are small because they have been poorly fed for genertaions and even centuries back. They will endure considerable hardship, and are coarsely built, and pretty ravenous eaters. Some of them give rich milk, as all small cattle do, and some give a proportionately large quantity. But they are not considered fine or even valuable in any particular. They are very far behind the Jersey in every respect. A Kerry cow may be fed presisely as a Jersey, but do better on coarse food such as straw, and make more milk with it than a Jersey.

Professor A. J. Cook, of the Michigan Agricultural College, has been for several years carefully observing the habits of bees, and probably knows more than any other man in this country about the busy little insects, takes no stock in the common opinion that bees recognize their keeper, and thinks that the only reason that they are more likely to sting a stranger is that "the latter is more nervous and so jerks his head or makes other quick motions which are offensive to the bees and sure to meet quick reproof."

In view of the unusual depredation by insects, we give space to the following practical suggestion from one of our correspondents. He informs us that a solution of saltpetre dissolved in water, in the proportion of a tablespoonful of the former to a gallon of the latter, and applied to vines, will effectually prevent the ravages of the destructive rosebug, and if applied around and upon cabbage and other plants, will prove a sure remedy against the cut-worm, cabbage worm, black beetle and other destructive pests.—Western Agriculturist.

Household Hints.

It is not a good plan to have the white lawn and cambric dresses "done up," as the phrase is, to lay away for the winter, for the expectation that they will look fresh and be ready for immediate wear in the spring will be disappointed. Of course, they should not be put away dirty, but the starching and ironing may be well left till spring; only common calicoes should be starched and ironed befor packing away.

Handsome bed-linen is receiving considerable attention. Sheets, pillow cases and shams are hemstitched and embroidered. For some a simple hem neatly done with drawn work is enough. Others are more elaborate, having squares and diamond shaped blocks appliqued with hemstitching and the edges inished with ruffles hemstitched or cut n points.

Starch which will not stick in white atches on your dark cambric dress is ade thus: Take the very best fine arch you can get, mix in the propor- n of two tablespoonfuls to as little as ll make a smooth paste, and to this l a pint of clear coffee; let it boil for minutes. Stir it with a sperm can- , strain it through a piece of muslin, l it is ready for use, and will be found y satisfactory.

ow To Keep Flowers.—As a general g flowers will droop and fade in a and night; yet there are kinds, like camelias and eupatoriums which be kept longer if the water is ged morning and night, and a few s of camphor spirits added to it. the faded flowers are put into a of scalding hot water deep enough er one-third of their stems, by the he water has cooled the flowers ave become fresh and erect. Then the ends of the stems, and put into cool water with a small bit of ter in it. Flowers will keep longer es of wet sand than in vases of n the fern leaves are required for dows, it is necessary to give them artificial tint of green as nearly like natural tint as you can make it, use exposure to strong light destroys ring matter not being supplied to flower or frond after it has been ered. What there is in the plant t be "stored" in it by burning the of the stalk before it is laid in blotpaper to dry. The ferns for a fire- n would not be exposed to strong ight. The different tints required mixed, and the frond is either laid a paper or table, and one coat by means of a large yet fine paint , or else they are dipped into the re. When it has dried on the they must be laid between papers ten and re-dry.

Work Bags.

y convenient workbags for art-workers are of ecru pongee a quare, hemmed on the edges, and with either fine white cambric or white pongee. If the latter is used, have the lining exactly the same size as the outside, and work sprays in silk embroidery on all four corners. Stitch casings around in a circle inside the square, and run in ribbon strings, so that the bag may be drawn up or lie flat on the lap with pleasure. If desired, pockets for silk, needle book, etc., can be stitched on the lining before it is sewed in.

Hints for Home Dressmaking.

A pretty and simple mode of renovating an old dress made with kilting at the foot and long round overskirt is to divide the plaiting into two or more narrow ones. Then sew the overskirt on to the foundation all round, just above this trimming, and turn it up, gathering or pleating it into the belt, forming the bag-like drapery known as the Worth overskirt. The extra length must be caught up here and there at the back and on the sides, to allow of easy fullness in the effect. The Jersey is the great resource of those who have woolen dress skirts which have outlived the bodices originally belonging to them. Indeed, it may be said to have taken permanent places as the fatigue dress waist in place of blouses, skirt-waists, etc. The better grades must be bought for wear with silks, but for old cashmeres, etc., a $3 Jersey is quite good enough. Should this be found too thin for wear in cold weather, the old dress waist, stripped of all trimming and carefully darned, may be worn as an under-waist.

Breeding for Butter.

Mr. G. W. Farlee says: The shadow of an out-cross is constantly hovering over the mind of inexperienced breeder, and the blood of some of the best cows has been thinned and dissipated by unwarranted fears of inbreeding. If I was to commence breeding in a small way with a view to establishing a future herd of fixed butter characteristics, I would select two good cows of a superior strain and a bull of another equally good family, and interbreed them for next 10 years, breeding father to daughter, son to mother and and half-brother to half-sister. As the result of my breeding of shorthorns experiences I have a fear of inter-breeding full brothers with full sisters unless it were to produce an impressive bull, or a heifer to cross with some other excellent family. My fears may be groundless. As the result of this system, I should expect at the expiration of 10 years to have a herd of cows that would average 25 to 50 per cent. larger butter yields than the original foundation stock."

Hay for Breeding Swine.

Mr. A. B. Cohen of Minnesota in describing a hog house in the Breeders' Gazette incidentally mentions the use of hay for feed. He has a tub of 40 bushels capacity and a steam generator. The horse power is connected by belt with a straw cutter in the upper story which is used to cut hay very fine, which hay, after being cut, is mixed in the scalding tub with meal, mill stuff and roots, the whole mass being steamed together. This hay is second growth or aftermath which is better than the first crop for this purpose. I mix it about equal bulk with other food, and after being steamed the hogs eat it with great relish and thrive nicely. Ensilage is also good food for store or breeding hogs, helping to keep them healthy and in good condition for the production of their young.

Tinsel Embroidery.

The newest idea in art needlework is tinsel embroidery—not the spangles and point russe stitched in gold thread which have been so long used—but raised flowers and fruits artistically done in tinsel, with leaves wrought in chenille arrasene. For this the fruit or flowers is first shaped in tufted cotton wool, which is afterward carefully and closely covered with the tinsel thread, giving the raised effect, on which much of the beauty of the work depends. Toilet sets of pin-cushion and bottles in satin or plush are very elegant in this work, which is also effectively used on screens and on panels. The prettiest of all embroideries, are, however, those done in ribbon and arrasene or chenille, with the petals of the flowers in wonderfully natural looking bits of ribbon of plush or velvet, while leaves and stems and vining is in shaded arrasene or fine chenille. Roses, red and white, wild roses, sweet briar, Marechal Neil and tea buds are alike faithfuly copied in these materials. A beautiful mantel lambrequin is of garnet plush, with a branch of wild roses trailing across its whole length, the blossoms in natural size, of pink silk, artistically folded and the buds bursting from calixes and sheaths of green chenille, while the leaves and stems are wrought in arrasene. The design on an exquisite screen is golden rod and sumac in feathery chenille, while a perfect sofa cushion shows a wreath of roses in pink plush with arrasene foliage.

When and What Will the End Be?

Under this head the New England Farmer has to say of the high prices for Jersey cattle:

A good many persons are wondering what will be the end of the excitement in prices of Jersey cattle, for to claim that there is no excitement among buyers when they are anxious to pay £2,000 or $3,000 for a single animal would be claiming what no one believes. An observant reader in New York state who was present at a recent auction sale of Jerseys in New York city, writes us, "that unless the price of that kind of stock keeps up a number of years somebody will get stuck. I saw a yearling heifer, Jennie Pogis, sold for $3,000, and Daisy Pogis for $2,400. I have not the courage to try my luck in Jerseys at these prices, though if they would keep up for the next 10 years it would do to buy a few calves at a moderate price, such as were sold at from $161 to $165, looking to be worth about $70.50, though hardly that."

But if $3 0 0 seems a high price to pay for a single animal, what shall we say of the statement which is just published on good authority that one of the farmers who is anxious to secure some good Jersey cows has recently visited Mr. Fuller's herd in Hamilton, Ont., and offered $20,000 for Mary Ann of St. Lamberts? And what shall we say of the refusal of such an offer? That two unwise men met? The same mail that brings the news of this great offer and refusal also brings the sad story of the death by milk fever of one of the noted butter cows, Valhalla 5,300, a cow that had made 34 pounds of butter in 14 days and was expected to beat her own record next summer. Mr. Farlee, the owner, in reporting his loss to the Breeder's Gazette says: "This seems to be the fate, earlier or later, of great milkers and butter makers."

Men who have $20,000 to offer or refuse for any single animals, and who can afford to take all the risks of carrying such property, may perhaps well spend their money in that way. It will benefit somebody probably. But farmers who don't make their money easily, or who have to borrow money for such speculation, had better stand back, keep cool, and look on. The public good calls for no sacrifice from such men.

Personal Matters.

Gen. Charles Gordon, generally known as "Chinese" Gordon, was only thirty years old when placed in command of a division of the Chinese army. He always went unarmed in battle, even when foremost in the breach, directing his troops by waving a little cane. As he was uniformly victorious in his engagements, his Chinese soldiers considered the cane to be a magic wand which insured his protection and their triumph. The general is a lofty and admirable type, honest as he is brave.

It is said that Mr. Henry Villard's grand excursion on the Northern Pacific railroad last summer was one of the causes which led to his downfall. It cost about $250,000 in the first place, and some of the guests were so alarmed concerning the enterprise when they saw the vast areas of unpeopled country through which the railroad runs that on arriving at Portland, Oregon, they began telegraphing to their agents and brokers, to sell their Northern Pacific stock. Then the decline of the stock began, and continued until Mr. Villard was obliged to succumb.

An aged colored man whom the Staunton Spectator has discovered in the solitude of East Tennessee, tells an original anecdote about General Jackson. According to this authority, the General having ridden up to a little tavern in Marysville and found a score or more of loungers who were not inclined to make a place for him in front of the fire, called to a servant: "Boy, have you got any oysters in the shell?" "Yes, massa, plenty of 'em." "Well, put my horse in the stable, and measure out a half-bushel of oysters and carry to him." The loungers speedily thinned out to see the horse eat oysters. The General, after enjoying the fire and seeing the boy, said: "Well boy, how is my horse getting on with his oysters?" "Oh, massa he ain't eating 'em." "Very well, bring 'em to me and give him some oats."

Ellen Terry, the great English actress who accompanies Irving in his dramatic tour in this country, is a married lady. Her husband is Mr. Wardell, an actor, and he has adopted the stage name of Charles Kelly. Miss Terry is, therefore, Mrs. Wardell in private life. She is the sister of Kate Terry, who visited Chicago twenty years ago with Charles Kean. She has two sisters on the English stage at the present time—Florence and Marion Terry.

Who is the wealthiest man in California? "Jim Flood, worth $100,000,000; he is a liberal man and a shrewd one. He had built up on San Francisco Bay a new port called Costa City, with magnificent storehouses and piers, from which the wood of those rich counties is shipped direct to Europe and the world. O'Brien, Flood's partner, is dead, and his fortune distributed. Mackey, one of the Bonanza crowd, is thought to be worth $60,000,000, and Jim Fair is worth perhaps $40,000,000."

Louis E. Salomon, the president of the black republic of Hayti, is described as a massive, broad-shouldered giant, at least six feet six inches in height, with the physical proportions of a gladiator; snow-white locks, keen, restless eyes, glittering like diamonds in a setting of jet, high, intellectual forehead, and a form, despite his advanced age, erect as a pillar of stone, with a dignified air. He was educated at one of the most famous colleges in Paris, and is a person of no ordinary ability, being a brilliant conversationalist and linguist and a crafty diplomat.

The death of John Trottet, of Geneva, N. Y., recalls a man of an energy and courage which have seldom been surpassed. He was born without legs, hands, or feet, yet he learned to write, fastening his pen at his elbow, and when he grew older became an active haymaker, used the reins with dexterity, and was so good a shot that he often carried off the village prizes for mark-firing. He was independent and sagacious, and has left a widow and four children amply provided for. Tempting offers were made to his parents and later to himself by showmen, but were invariably declined.

Little Benny Browster.

According to the Washington Sunday Capital the president is not always perfectly happy with a travelling party made up from his cabinet. A gossiper in the paper says: "Several members of the cabinet and the ladies of their families were invited with the president to be at the Astor ball last Monday, but the president did not leave Washington until Tuesday, and the only cabinet family at the ball was that of the attorney general. The president evidently did not want to make up a cabinet party to visit New York this time, his experience at the opening of the Brooklyn bridge having taught him to exercise more caution in such matters. I may as well go on and tell what it was that happened then to make it not quite pleasant for Mr Arthur. I shall have at once to refer to that infant terrible, the Benny Brewster; for it is this young person whose presence and performances have cast a shadow over the social enjoyments of the executive of this great republic. Other members of the cabinet usually leave their children behind them when invited by the president to make up a social party, but Brewster—be left behind? No, never! He goes everywhere, and he went to the opening of the Brooklyn bridge in the president's special car with his father and mother. Benny went because he always goes where he wants to, and things then went on not so very badly until at dinner time, when to the surprise of everybody, the youth insisted on accompanying his parents to the table, although no provision had been made for him. He is said to have resorted to the usual infantile weapons of kicks and screams, and there was such a dreadful row that the president was very much annoyed. Mr. Brewster said he would go to a separate table to appease the child. The president, thinking this very awkward, said that he would sit with the two Bennys; and although Mr. Phillips tried to induce him to exchange places, the dinner went off in this fashion with the president at a side table. The recollections of this affair, furnished sufficient reasons for having no cabinet party to the Astor ball. Mr. and Mrs. Brewster and Benny went off by themselves, on Sunday in order to be there, and the rest of the cabinet people stayed at home."

Millemaine is the name of a new cereal which has been introduced into South Carolina from Columbia, South America. It is allied to sorghum and Guinea corn, and has the merit of an almost unlimited capacity to endure drouth. Cakes made from the meal have been describnd as better than corn cakes, and the grain has been pronounced by the chemist of the Savanah Guano Company superior in food qualities to wheat. The Western papers are wanting to know if this is a dummy set up by the bears to scare the bulls away from the wheat stack.

A Boston letter to the Philadelphia Press reports that a singular fraud has just been unearthed at Havard: "It was found," says the correspondent, "that in the present freshman class were two students who had hired some one to pass examinations for them. The particulars of one case were told me, and, possibly, the second is only an addition made by rumor to the truth. This young man's father, himself a Havard graduate, hired a man, also an alumnus, to take his son's examination. The deception would seem to be so easy that it is strange that it has not been tried before, as indeed, it may have been. In the present case the student could not be expelled, as, not having passed his examination, he has never been a member of the college.

San Francisco, Cal.—The Chronicle publishes in substance the following marvel: Captain W. F. Swasey, the oldest pioneer of the coast, makes a statement of the intense suffering of his friend Colonel D. J. Williamson, an Army officer of distinction, and an Ex-U. S. Consul, who was attacked in the winter of 1861-2 with violent rheumatism. So great was his agony in after years, he became a helpless cripple, and after trying numberless remedies, the baths of other countries and spending a fortune of $20,000, the desease seemed to assume a more virulent type. Finally, he was persuaded to try St. Jacobs Oil, the great conqueror of pain. It worked a miracle of cure. In a letter to the Chronicle he confirms Capt. Swasey's statement and adds: "I cheerfully give my unqualified attestation to the truthfulness of the statement, because I feel perfectly certain that a knowledge of my cure by St. Jacobs Oil, will prove the means of relieving hundreds of sufferers."

The ship canal between the Baltic Sea and the German Ocean will, it is estimated, save a journey of six hundred miles for a vessel making a trip between either of those waters, as the circumnavigation of the peninsula of Jutland will be unnecessary. In all, the proposed canal will be only some fifty miles—or about half that of the Suez Canal—extending from Gluckstadt to Keil.

The cigar and tobacco world says: "The encroachments which smoking have made within the last few years are many and well defined. The smoker has the right to smoke in the palace car, the sleeping car, the common car, the horse car; he can smoke on the ferry-boat, and on the steamer deck, fore, aft and midships; he smokes in hotel corridors, in all public buildings; in fact, nearly everywhere except churches."

CONSUMPTION.

Dr. Meredith, Dentist, of Cincin'ti, was thought to be in the last stages of Consumption, and was induced by his friends to try Allen's Lung Balsam after the formula was shown him. We have his letter that it at once cured his cough and that he was able to resume his practice.

Jeremiah Wright, of Marion County, W. Va., writes us that his wife had Pulmonary Consumption and was pronounced incurable by their physician, when the use of Allen's Lung Balsam entirely cured her. She says that she and her neighbors think it the best medicine in the world.

Wm. C. Digges, Merchant, of Bowling Green, Va., writes April 4, 1881, that he wants us to know that the Lung Balsam has cured his mother of Consumption, after the physician had given her up as incurable. He says others knowing her case have taken the Balsam and been cured. He thinks all so afflicted should give it a trial.

Wm. A. Graham & Co., Wholesale Druggists Zanesville, Ohio, write us of the cure of Matthias Freeman, a well-known citizen, who had been afflicted with Bronchitis in its worst form for twelve years. The Lung Balsam cured him as it has cured many others of Bronchitis.

CANCER
The experience in the treatment of Cancer with Swift's Specific (S. S. S.) would seem to warrant us in saying that it will cure this much dreaded scourge. Persons so afflicted are invited to correspond with us.

I believe Swift's Specific has saved my life. I had virtually lost use of the upper part of my body and my arms from the poisonous effects of a large cancer on my neck, from which I had suffered for 20 years. S. S. S. has relieved me of all soreness, and the poison is being forced out of my system. I will soon be well. W. R. Robison, Davisboro, Ga.

Two months ago my attention was called to the case of a woman afflicted with a cancer on her shoulder at least 5 inches in circumference, angry, painful, and giving the patient no rest day or night for 6 months. I obtained a supply of Swift's Specific for her. She has taken 5 bottles, and the ulcer is entirely healed up, only a very small scab remaining and her health is better than for 5 years past; seems to be perfectly cured. Rev. Jesse H. Campbell, Columbus, Ga.

I have seen remarkable results from use of Swift's Specific on a cancer. A young man here has been afflicted five years with the most angry looking eating cancer I ever saw, and was nearly dead. The first bottle made a wonderful change, and after five bottles were taken, he is nearly or quite well. It is truly wonderful. M. F. Crumley, M. D., Oglethorpe, Ga.

A TRIUMPH OF LOVE.

You must, Allie."

"But, mother—"

"But, my dear child, you need a holiday, and Lettie will expect you."

"How can I leave you mother?"

And Allie Wentworth knelt down by her mother's chair, and laid her head against the arm.

Mrs. Wentworth stroked the soft brown hair framing the delicate pale face, her eyes full of fondest love.

"Foolish child! Do you expect to be always so devoted to your old worn out mother?" she said, aquiver in her voice.

"Yes, indeed I do; and you must not talk about being old and worn out. We will grow old together."

Her mother smiled.

"Well, but that need not prevent the holiday. Martha will take care of me. You must go, dear. I command you!"

"Then I must obey," said Allie, a bright smile flashing over her face.

She was not exactly a pretty girl but one who would be attractive and lovable through age as well as youth, for the loveliness of her nature.

She had once cherished bright dreams of love and happy marriage, like other girls; but two years before her mother has been stricken down with paralysis, and for a long time they thought she would die.

Poor Allie! It was a dark time to her, for she was the only child of a widowed mother, and they had been devoted to each other.

She gave up her work, and for weeks lived right beside that sick bed; but at last the doctors pronounced the dear invalid out of danger, and though she would never be well and strong again, the simple sparing of her life was enough to be forever grateful for.

Henceforth Allie sternly banished romance from her mind, and went bravely and cheerfully back to the dressmaking shop; for though they had a small income, it was not sufficient for all their expenses.

Now, a letter from Lettie Harvey, an old school friend, had interrupted the sober routine of her life.

Lettie was going to be married, and urged her dear Allie to come to the wedding. She lived in a village not far from the city, and Allie did feel a wistful longing to escape for a short time to a freer atmosphere.

She would have put down the desire, and made her home duties an excuse for not accepting her friend's invitation; but her mother took the matter into her own hands, and sent her away.

Lettie was delighted to see her friend, and after telling her about her own love affair, said,—

"I sent for you, not only to see me married, Lettie, dear, but also to meet the nicest fellow in the world—next to Arthur"

"Nonsense, Lettie, you know that I do not care for such as that," said Allie, flushing.

"But you ought to. Do you intend to be an old maid?"

"Yes!" firmly and decidedly.

"Cross as two sticks—sour as a crab-apple! Oh, yes, I can see you now—a wrinkled, withered little witch, with a whisp of hair about as big as my finger, and shoulders bent almost double!"

Allie laughed, stole a glance at her slender, but straight, well rounded figure, her bright soft eyes, and youthful face—then relapsed into gravity.

"I shall never marry, Lettie."

"Why not?" impatiently

"Because I cannot desert my mother!"

"Nobody but a brute would ask you to do that!" exclaimed Lettie, indignantly. "I am sure Roy Stuart would not."

"Who?"

"Roy Stuart."

"Is that his name?"

"Yes. What do you think of it?"

"Altogether too romantic."

"Pshaw! It is a fine name, and just suits him. He is rather large, and dark, and handsome, I think, with beautiful grey eyes. Moreover, he is good and noble. He is Arthur's best friend; and just think how nice it would be to live here near together! I am sure this pure air would strengthen your mother."

"Do hush, Lettie! You talk as though I had nothing to do but signify my willness, and the gentleman would propose," said Allie, rising and walking to the window, somewhat disturbed.

The bride-elect turned her engagement ring round on her pretty, plump finger, a half-smile on her face.

Her school-girl friendship had survived time and absence, and she felt an unselfish desire to see her friend as happy as she herself.

"She is a tender, loving creature. She would make an adorable wife and a devoted mother. She must get that foolish notion of self-sacrifice out of her head, or her life will be spoiled," mused the girl, silently.

Allie met Arthur Wooton, her friend's affianced, that evening; but not thus quietly was she destined to meet his friend.

The second day after her arrival she was persuaded to go out riding with Lettie. Now she was not an experienced horsewoman, and unfortunately her horse had not been exercised for two or three days; and when beyond the limits of the village, he was disposed to take control.

"Pray be careful! I am afraid he will run away!" exclaimed Lettie in alarm. "Dear me, if he should!"

"Don't mention it!" gasped Allie, growing pale, and pulling hard at the rein.

Well, he didn't exactly run away, but when they came near the banks of a river he bolted, and could not be pulled up until he stood in the middle of the ford.

His luckless rider did not stop then, for when he halted so suddenly and unexpectedly, she pitched headlong out of the saddle into the water.

It was not really a dangerous fall, but oh, how ridiculous and mortifying! There she sat in the middle of the stream, bare-headed and dripping wet, when a young man, attracted by Lettie's shrieks, hastened out of the woods, his gun in his hand.

Flinging down gun and game-bag, he waded in to the rescue of the unfortunate Allie.

"What an absurd mishap! Don't ask me to ever ride again," she said, shaking out her dripping habit.

"Thank heaven, you are unhurt!" cried Lettie, gratefully. "And thank Roy for coming to the rescue," she added, with a flash of mischief in her eyes.

Allie glanced quickly up into the gray eyes she had heard called beautiful, then blushed deepest crimson.

That was how she met Mr. Stuart, and though she told herself it made no difference what kind of an impression she made on him; she could not think of her dishevelled, half-drowned appearance with anything but disgust.

"Gracious heavens, what a fright!" she murmured, when safe in her own room she went, girl-like, to the mirror the first thing.

Determined that the second impression should be better than the first, she made a careful toilet that evening, and appeared at her brightest and best.

Mr. Stuart, who proved to be as intelligent and agreeable as goodlooking, devoted himself to her entertainment in a quiet, unobtrusive way.

Lettie's wedding preparations went merrily on, and the bridegroom's best friend seemed to be deeply interested in them. He certainly called on the Harveys as often as he could, and never failed to seek out Alice.

As time passed on she grew almost frightened at herself, she felt so changed so unlike the sober-minded, resolute girl of former days.

"I am losing all the practical commonsense I have gained in two years, and going back to the romantic dream of younger days. I must stop. I must go home she thought," with a troubled sigh.

But Lettie married, and went away on a short tour, and still she lingered, for she could not get away for the urgent entreaties of the family to stay and help arrange Lettie and Arthur's house, and her mother wrote for her to prolong her visit.

Half laughing, half vexed, she consented.

"It seems as if the whole world has conspired against me, mother included. What would she say if she knew? But I will not be a coward and run away!" blushing furiously.

It was exciting, delightful employment furnishing a house. Sometimes she would make believe it was her own, and many sweet thoughts flitted through her mind while she helped to arrange the pretty rooms.

Mr. Stuart had his share of the work, too, and once she stood at the front door waiting for him, a bright, welcoming smile on her lips.

He sprang up the steps, and catching her hand, kissed it warmly.

"I could almost imagine this home, and you—"

But snatching her hand away, she hastily retreated to the little kitchen, where Lettie's younger sisters were putting away dishes and pots and pans.

At last it was all ready for habitation, and they went through the house a merry inspecting party, late one afternoon, but when they reached the parlor, the younger people went on out into the garden, leaving Roy and Allie alone.

A small fire had been kindled in the grate, for it was September, and frosty, and the girl sat down before it to warm her hands. She looked rather pale and fagged out, not from physical labor, but mental unrest.

Roy stood on the hearth rug near her, and when she started up unable to endure his earnest steadfast look any longer, he gently detained her.

"Your work and mine has been finished here, but must we part? Will you not marry me. Allie—be my dear, honored wife? I love you so truly, darling!"

"You have learned the lesson quickly," she said, striving hard to keep cool and composed.

"But none the less surely, my dearest, you will say yes?"

"No, no!" she cried, sharply, finding it terribly hard to resist his tenderness. "I have resolved never to marry. My mother is an invalid. She needs me, and my duty is to remain with her."

"Yes, I know all your trials. I only ask to share your duties, not to take you from them. Your mother shall be my mother, and together we shall take care of her. I am a lonely fellow, Allie. I have no mother."

"No, I will not be tempted. You would feel burdened after awhile, and wish that you had been less rash."

He drew back, a change passing over his face.

"Do you really think that? Is that your opinion of me?"

"Yes."

"Then I will not trouble you any longer!"

And before she could make any reply, he had left the room, and the house.

A moment of breathless silence, and then she called to him to come back—that she had overrated her strength—she could not make the sacrifice. But he did not hear, and only the children rushed in to tell her it was time to go home.

The next day she returned home, and to work; but not much satisfaction did she feel, and none at all when her mother, in one of their long confidential talks, told her it was her dearest wish to see her married.

Allie never breathed a word about her romance, but she laid her head down on her mother's knee, with a long quivering sigh.

When she returned home from work, one evening a few weeks later, her mother innocently crushed the last lingering hope she might have cherished, by telling her that a gentleman had called to see her.

"A Mr. Roy Stuart from Australia. He called to bid you good-bye before going to Australia."

"To Australia? Then I shall never see him again" she thought, pale and faint with bitter disappointment.

After that she settled down in earnest; and when, after a year from the date of her marriage, Lettie wrote, urging her to take another holiday, she consented knowing that to keep up her strength she must rest occasionally.

Her happy friend had a thousand things to tell, but not once did she mention Roy Stuart's name, and Allie could not question her.

In the evening she went into the parlor and sat down, as on that other evening when she had so rashly thrown her happiness away. She looked into the fire, so busy with bitter-sweet memories she did not hear the door open, or turn to see who entered—until a well-remembered voice said,—

"Good evening, Mrs. Wooton, Arthur —"

She sprang up, then, with a joyful cry.

"Mr. Stuart! Is it possible?"

Then they stood, hand clasping hand, looking at each other with silent lips, but eloquent eyes.

"I thought you were in Australia," said Allie at last, her glance falling.

"No I returned a few days ago. Can it be true you are glad to see me?"

"Is it hard to realize?" she said, in a low—very low tone, her cheeks deeply flushed.

"Oh, yes after your unkind treatment last time we were together in this room."

"Did I behave badly?"

"Yes, cruelly."

"And is it too late to make amends?"

Her eyes were sparkling, and a demure little smile played round her lips.

"Not if you——Allie, you are no trifling with me?"

"Do I look like it? Ah! Roy, I have been miserable!" she cried, tears rushing to her eyes.

"And so have I, my darling!" he said, drawing her near to him.

"It was all a mistake. I could not be strongminded and sacrifice myself; and then—and then, it was not desired. If you had not been so hasty—"

"And if you had not been so distrustful. Dear wife of mine, kiss me, for forgiveness, for joy, and then for a pledge of future peace. That dream home seems very near to-night."

William Meagle, an important witness in the Phœnix park trial, complains that his life is made miserable owing to the continued persecution and frequent assaults which he suffers at the hands of sympathizers with the assassins of Lord Frederick Cavendish and Mr. Burke.

It has been decided that the pope shall nominate at the consistory in March one American bishop, namely Father Jean Da Capistrano, a capuchin brother who will be named bishop of Cordova in the Argentine Republic.

Washington's Colored People.

Wash. Cor. New York Sun.

There are 65,000 colored people in Washington. In no city in the United States, not even in New Orleans, is there a larger colored population. Many of them have settled there since the civil war ended. A better opportunity can be nowhere found for studying the effect of freedom and the legislation subsequent to it than there. The colored people there enjoy all the social and political rights that law can give them without protest and without annoyance.

The public conveyances are open to them, and the theaters, the jurybox, the spoils of party power, are theirs. Many of these men are wealthy, and the aggregate wealth of the colored property-owners in the District amounts to millions of dollars. Hundreds own comfortable homes, and some handsome residences: their churches are many, including three or four buildings that are ornaments to the city. As a class they are industrious, find plenty to do, and are beginning to show capacity for thrift and saving.

But the color line is rigidly drawn in what is known as society. Wealth, learning, official place, give no colored family the right or privilege of entering the best or the commonest white society on terms of equality or endurance. In this respect the colored race lives as separate and as exclusive a life as in the days of slavery, and, as a drop of African blood was once held to make a man a negro, so now it taints him and makes an insurmountable barrier against social recognition. The most striking illustration of the tendency of the race to imitate the white people is seen in their own social circles, classes and customs. First of all we find that in this large colored community social lines are as rigidly drawn as they are between themselves and the white society of the West End. There are three recognized social classes among the colored people. Neither acknowledge the others, and it is the ambition of those in the lower to be received in the higher circles, just as among the whites.

The upper crust, so to speak, consists of men of wealth, learning and high political place. These people exchange calls, with all the ceremony of the whites, some of them driving in their own carriages, leaving cards with scrupulous attention to etiquette. They dine with each other, and are waited upon by colored servants with whom they will permit no other relations than those of master and servant. Probably the leading family in the highest colored society here is that of ex-Senator Bruce, who is now the register of the treasury. Bruce is a light-complexioned, intelligent looking man. He is said to be worth about a hundred thousand dollars. He lives in a handsome house that he owns on M street. It is richly furnished. A superb piano stands in the reception-room, and a choice collection of books lines the wall of the library. Mrs. Bruce is a handsome woman, with not a suggestion of her race in her face, and whose manners are regarded as the consummation of ease, grace and courtesy. She dresses as richly and as handsomely as any woman in the city. In official circles Mr. Bruce is always received with courtesy, and as a political equal, but there the line is drawn. Mr. Bruce entertains his friends handsomely, and his wife pays and receives calls from those of her select set with unvarying regard for prevailing etiquette. Another member of this social circle is John F. Cook, the collector of taxes for the District. He lives in excellent style and entertains handsomely. Prof. J. M. Gregory, professor of Latin at the Howard University, and John M. Langston, the minister to Hayti, with their families, are recognized members of the best colored society, while Dr. Charles B. Purvis' society and that of his wife are eagerly sought.

Dr. Purvis is a very busy man, being the surgeon in charge of the Freedman's Hospital, and the professor of materia medica at the hospital school. Nearly all of his scholars are white. Dr. Augusta and his wife also are received in the highest circles of colored society while Dr. Augusta, as a physican, commands the respect of his white brethern in the profession. Mr. Henry Smith, for many years the librarian of the House of Representatives, entertains a great deal, and his wife calls in her own carriage. R. T. Greener, a member of the District bar and a graduate of Howard, and his wife, who is an accomplished musician, are much in society. The Rev. Dr. Alex Crummel, rector of the leading colored church of the Episcopalian denomination, is always welcomed. He is regarded as the most learned colored man in the District, and is highly respected by the white clergy of his denomination. Of course Fred Douglass ranks as the leading colored man of the District, but he goes but little into society. He lives on his fine estate on the Eastern Branch of the Potomac. Douglass is worth $200,000. While his wealth and ability make him easily the foremost man of his race, he is not popular. He is regarded as guilty of the same sins toward the colored men of which he accuses the whites, namely, refusal to recognize them or have personal relations with them.

Mr. M. M. Holland, who is an officer in the Postoffice department, is said to be the best classical scholar in the District, and his attainments bring him the highest social recognition of his people.

Wormley, of Wormley's hotel, is a leader of the best set on account of his wealth, reputed to be $150,000, and his relations with prominent white men. Smith Wormley, one of his sons, is a large owner of real estate here, and another son has an excellent practice as a physician.

Because of their exclusiveness, wealth, learning and prominence, this circle is not looked upon with any favor by the majority of the colored people here. The usual remark, which may perhaps be attributed to envy or disappointed ambition, that one hears among colored people, is that this exclusive set is not good enough for white society, and too good for that of their own race. Fortunately, there are enough of them to make a sufficiently large circle for the social life they desire.

There is another and a much larger society here that may be designated as of the second rank. While holding no social relations with the set just mentioned, they are equally exclusive as regards those whom they hold beneath them in the social scale. This class is composed of government clerks and of people in comfortable circumstances. There are a good many colored men in government employ as clerks. These from the basis of the society of the rank. Many of them own comfortable little homes, and one of the finest streets in the city is occupied by them. This is 16th street, between the Scott statue and the White House. It is a splendid avenue, broad, well paved, and in the heart of the most fashionable part of the city. Nearly all of these colored residents own their houses, and refuse to sell. The property is very valuable, and must ultimately pass out of their possession. These people are very fond of social life, but they do not find it in entertaining, but rather in sociables, balls, picnics, and especially in their churches. They are well dressed, seem to prosper, and are happy. For the great bulk of the colored population—the servants, laborers, and the poor—they have sympathy, but no more have social relations with them than a white family would. These latter in the main are shiftless, living from hand to mouth; happy if they do nothing, happy, if they get a job. Their social instincts are gratified by the organization and maintenance of societies of all sorts, benevolent, patriotic, social and economic. There are nearly one hundred of these organizations, supported almost entirely by the laboring colored people.

STAGE-ROBBING ROMANCE.

A tall heavily bearded man, with the swinging stride peculiar to western men, walked into Sergeant James' room at the Tombs yesterday and asked for Officer Speight. The venerable officer, who is a brother of the late Inspector Speight, was pointed out, and the stranger, approaching him, said:

"How are you Uncle?"

"Go away, now," said the old officer; "you can't play any bunco game on me!"

"But I am your nephew, and I have just returned from California, where I have been since 1846. You may recall my name—Harry N. Morse."

The speaker was the famous California detective, the captor of Black Bart, the stage robber. Officer Speight jumped from his chair, warmly grasped his nephew's hand, and said: "Sit down and tell us all about yourself."

Detective Morse leaned back in his chair and said: "Well, first of all, I'm glad to see my native city again. The only place that still seems familiar is the Ninth Ward. I have seen a great deal of life since I left here in 1846. I have been miner, store-keeper, liquor-dealer, horse-dealer, sheriff of Almeada county, chief of police, United States special agent, and detective. Now that I have finished up my last job and captured Black Bart I mean to take a good rest."

"What kind of a man is Black Bart?" asked Sergt. James.

"Well, he is the most daring road agent and stage robber the west has ever seen. He began operations by robbing the Fort Rose and Russian River stage, August 3, 1877. He always wears a flour sack thrown over his head, and an old slouch hat. He jumps in between the horses' heads, and leveling his shot-gun at the driver orders the box thrown out. The stage goes on, he breaks open the box with an old axe and takes out the contents.

"After the first robbery came the robbery of the Quincy and Orville stage, July 25, 1878; Laporte and Orville stage, July 30, 1878; Cahto and Ukiah stage, Oct. 2, 1878; Corvello and Ukiah stage, Oct. 3, 1878; Yreka and Redding stage, Oct. 23 1878; Alturas and Redding stage, Oct. 27, 1879; Weaverville, and Shosta stage, Sept. 1, 1881; Yreka and Redding stage again, Oct. 8, 1881; Alturas and Redding stage again, Oct. 11, 1881; Downieville and Maryville stage, Dec. 15, 1881; San Juan and Smartsville stage, Dec. 27, 1881; Ukiah and Cloverdale stage, Jan. 25, 1882; Laporte and Orville stage again, July 13, 1882. This time George Hackett, Wells, Fargo & Co.'s messenger, fired two shots at the robber without effect. The Yreka and Redding stage was again robbed on Sept. 17, 1882, and on Nov. 24, 1882, the Lakeport and Coverdale stage was held up. There were other stage robberies, but it was certain that Black Bart was responsible for these, as he left his signature behind him. The county constables could do nothing, and the express company secured my services.

There was a reward of $300 in each case, making a total of $12,800—a sum worth earning. On making inquiries, myself and my man found that the robber had called at farm houses for meals, and that he always carried a roll of blankets, in which was his shot gun. Little by little we found that he was an American, over fifty years of age, five feet, ten inches in height, prominent cheek bones, gray hair, drooping gray moustache and goatee, two front teeth missing, complains of throat disease, great lover of coffee, wears No. 8 boots, and is of respectable appearance and manner. That description cost us months of hard work. We were narrowing down the circle when he played into our hands. On November 3d last he stopped the Sonora and Milton stage, near Copperapolis, and carried off gold worth $4,800, and he left behind three pairs of cuffs and a perfumed handkerchief, bearing the marks of a laundry. There are ninety-one laundries in San Francisco, and we finally found the right one kept by Mr. Ware, in Bush street. Mr. Ware said that the handkerchief was the property of Mr. C. E. Bolton, of No. 37 2d street. Just then Bolton came along, and I was introduced to him as Hamilton. I said I wanted to have a few moments conversation with him about mines, and we walked to Wells, Fargo & Co.'s office, where he was cross examined for three hours by Mr. J. B. Hume. He was elegantly dressed, and stood the ordeal well. But myself and Detective Tuacker had searched his room and found a counterpart of the handkerchief perfumed with the same odor, and also a letter, the handwriting of which was identical with the writing of Black Bart. His real name, Charles E. Boles, was shown by an inscription in a pocket Bible, which read: "Presented to Charles E. Boles, first sergeant, company B, 116th Illinois Volunteer Infantry, by his wife, as a New Year's gift, 1855." He still maintained his innocence, and was locked up.

"I then found he was known to a great many policemen as Charles Barlow, they having met him at a resturant where he boarded for five years past. Next morning we took him to Stockton to a hunter, known as "Old Martin", who had seen and conversed with the robber. No sooner did Martin see him than he said, 'That's he.' He was locked up in the Stockton jail, where I had a talk with him, which resulted in his making a full confession and offering to restore the treasure of the Copperapolis robbery, which he had concealed in his lair in the mountains. Horses were procured, and I never shall forget that night's ride of thirty miles through the mountains. Boles showed the genial side of his nature, and joked, told stories, and even sang. We reached the place at last. It was a hollow among the rocks, where Boles could lay on his blankets, sweep the country round with his glass, and see the approaching stage miles away. He stooped down, shoved away some earth and brought up the gold. My task was ended, and I returned to San Francisco. Black Bart's now in the San Andreas jail, where he will remain until his removal to the state prison at San Quentice."

"How much will he get?" inquired an attentive policeman.

"Oh I suppose about twenty years," answered Mr. Morse. "I don't know whether I will return to California, for I had some idea of settling down here, where I was born."

Men have commenced work clearing away the debris of the large hotel, which was burned at Carrington on the 11th of December last. The contract has been given for a counterpart of the building burned, with the exception of some improvements. The building will be three stories high with mansard roof, brick veneered. When finished complete it will cost $20,000.

THE REBEL GENERALS.

The Great Majority of the Leaders of the Southern Armies Dead—Present Occupations of the Remainder —Reminiscences of a West Pointer.

From the Boston Advertiser.

Washington, Dec. 8.—Twenty years ago the north kept in mind the leading generals of the rebel side, and discussed their merits with as much interest as was shown with the leaders of its own armies. Many of them had been prominent in the regular army before the war. Some were connected with northern families. "What has become of these men?" I asked of an old West Pointer and brilliant general officer the other day. He thought a minute. "Why, the majority of them are dead," was the reply. Then he went on to take up some of of those historic names. With many of their owners he had served in Mexico and in India wars without number. "Yes, the greater part of these men are dead, a much larger proportion than of our northern Generals. After the war most of them broke down. The fact was the rebels suffered more than we did. They had a harder time in the field, lived poorly, and were disposed to disease than our men. Lee, Anderson, Bragg, Magruder, Breckinridge, Hood, Forest, Price, Pemberton, 'Dick' Taylor, Pillow, Floyd, Hardee and Ewell were among them. The majority had been in the regular army. They went, with the South for State pride and in part because they were frozen out. I shall not forget Anderson. He was a captain in the dragoons out in Utah. When his resignation was accepted and he went away from the rest of us, the tears were in his eyes. "I am going back to South Carolina to raise hogs and hominy until the war is over," he said, "I will never fight the old flag." But in a month the tide was too strong for him. They made him Military Governor of Charleston and a Corps commander in Lee's army. He died of a broken heart right after the war. Lee never wanted to resign, but, like Johnston, he was made to feel that the Northern officers distrusted him. It was so with Johnston. In 1861 he was Quartermaster General, but old Simon Cameron transacted all his business with subordinate officers. At last Johnston went to him. "Mr. Secretary," he said, "you pay no attention to me."

"No," was the reply; "you are a Virginian, and sympathize with the rebels." 'I do not,' answered Johnston, 'but I shall resign, rather than be ignored. It is not because I have any desire to join the south.' Yet in three months he had drifted into a general's commission in Dixie. Johnston is an old man now, not less than 75. Bragg died several years ago, at his home in North Carolina. I knew him in the Mexican war. He was captain of Artillery then, and one of the bravest men in the army. But he was a martinet, and his men hated him. At Monterey some of them hid a lighted six-ounce shell under his bed. The explosion blew Bragg 100 feet and wrecked the tent, but he was not hurt. And yet they had a sort of pride. During the whole war his old battery carried Bragg's Artillery, on its guidons. Some of the volunteers were mad about it, but in vain. Magruder died ten years ago. Forrest, the murderer of negro prisoners at Fort Pillow, lived only a little while after the surrender. So it was with Ewell, Lee's bravest lieutenant, who rode strapped to his saddle in every compaign after the first Bull Run, where he lost a leg. He was breveted for bravery at Cherubusco. There was Hardee. He was a Lieutenant Colonel of Dragoons at 39, but he went south with the rest. After the war he started the first orange plantation in Florida, and died there three or four years ago. Price is dead. So is Dick Taylor. Taylor was Jefferson Davis' brother-in-law, and made Lieutenant-General on that account. Pemberton lived out the remains of his days at Philadelphia. He never recovered from his surrender to Grant at Vicksburg. Of the few Northern men who joined the rebels, he was one, but his wife was Southern, and carried him over. Another case was Roswell Ripley, of Ohio. He was a West Point graduate, and did well in Mexico. His wife was a South Carolina woman, That was the secret of his choice. During the war he commanded Fort Sumter and defended it bravely. I am told that he and Quincy A. Gilmore were boys together in the same neighborhood in Ohio. If that was so, they must have thought of it when Gilmore sat down on Morris Island to shell Ripley out of Sumter. Floyd, Buchanan's secretary of war never came to the surface after his midnight desertion of Fort Donelson. Pillow, his comrade in that trip, lived on his plantation in Tennessee a few years after hostilities ceased. He had been a major-general in the Mexican war, and did creditable service there. I believe he was President Polk's law partner, and got the appointment that way. The pluckiest man in the war was George Pickett He was a young Second Lieutenant just from the academy in 1846, and was assigned to a department in Washington Territory of which old Gen. Harney was in command. We were quarreling then over the boundary. Harney put Pickett on San Juan Island, which connects Puget Sound. He held it against an English squadron, and it has never been lost. Pickett commanded a division at Gettysburg under Longstreet. His assault of the third day was the greatest charge of the fight. His men fought with mine about our guns. We drove them back, but Pickett came nearer winning that fight than it is pleasant to think of. Yes, he is dead.

"Of those who are alive, Beauregard and Jubal Early are managers of the Louisians lottery. They get $10,000 each, and so great is the feeling still existing in the South over their generals, that one of the lottery managers told me the other day that their names were worth more to the company than their salaries. Both of them were West Pointers and artillery officers, but Beauregard never was a soldier. He is a dapper Creole gentleman, and the Lousianians swear by him. Early fought well. Longstreet comes to Washington occasionally. He is United States Marshal in Georgia, but his magnificent physique is showing the effects of his wounds. In Mexico he and Grant were Lieutenants in the same regiments. After the war Grant induced him to join the Republican party. He has been under a ban in the South ever since, but never without the consolation of a good office. I only remember one other prominent rebel who is a Republican. McLaws was reconstructed and is postmaster at Savannah. Lee used to say of McLaws' division that it was always ready for a fight. A good many of them have drifted into politics on the other side. Joseph Wheeler, weight 107 pounds, and the best cavalry officer, next to Stuart, in rebeldom, is member of Congress from Alabama; M. C. Butler and Wade Hampton represent South Carolina in the Senate. Butler lost his right leg at Brandy Station in 1863, where Wade Hampton's son was killed. Hampton was one of the richest men in the State. He raised, armed and equipped, at his own expense, the Hampton Legion and a regiment of cavalry and artillery; Mahone came to the front in the last campaign about Richmond and is a senator; Johnston has been in congress; Senator Morgan of Alabama, rose from the ranks to be brigadier general; in fact of the ten congressmen from that state, nine were in the rebel army; so with all but one of the Arkansas delegation; Senators Cockrell, Maxey and Ransom were major generals. One of the doorkeepers of the senate is Cadmus Wilcox, one of the best major generals of Lees Second Corps.

"General Lee's son, William H., succeeded his father as president of the Washington and Lee university in Virginia. His nephew, Fitzhugh, lives on one of the family estates at West Point, which McClellan made his base depot, before the famous change of base to Harrison's Landing. Both of them are rich, for the family estates are among the best in Virginia. For Arlington, last winter, Congress voted them $150,000 although it was confiscated while Lee was in arms against the flag. Another son, G. W. Curtis Lee, lives in Virginia. D. H. Hill lives somewhere in Virginia, but no one seems to know where. Buckner, who was man enough to stay in Fort Donelson, and surrendered with his men, is in Kentucky. Last year he came near being nominated for Governor over Proctor Knott. His wife inherited a large estate in Chicago. At West Point he and Rosecrans were close friends. During the whole war the latter managed his friend's property, and returned it to him afterward."

My friend took up the West Point register and pointed out that of those of whom he had spoken, all but Breckinridge, Forest, Price, Taylor, Floyd, Pillow, Butler, Hampton, Mahone, and Cockrell were West Point graduates and regular army men. "We had a perfect hegira of Southern officers in the early days of 1861," he added, "but the people at Washington did not seem anxious to keep them, and their resignation were accepted as fast as they were sent in. No one had to leave without his discharge. I only know one man among all those who joined the rebels who laid himself open to the charge of desertion. And with him it was only a technical offense 'Bee' Robinson was a Captain in the dragoons He was a Virginian and full of secession. His station was out in Utah somewhere, and he sent in his resignation. At the same time he started east himself. In some way they heard of it at headquarters, and his application was rejected. He knew nothing of this, and went south. Not appearing, he was dismissed as a deserter; when hostilities finished he was a confederate brigadier. Since then he has been an insurance agent; but when he sent up his application for an amnesty it was returned from the war department because he had not been discharged from the army. He, Davis and Toombs are the three who have not been restored to their civil rights of all those who went into the war for slavery and secession.

THE MEXICANS.

Features of Life in New Mexico—Characteristics of a People.

Correspondence Wheeling Intelligence.

New Mexico is an immense country and also a very peculiar country. Its largest town is Las Vegas, and is a place of 9,000 people—so the citizens say at least—and you know how prone people are to tell the truth about the size of their towns. The late Thomas Carlyle once said that England was a country of 23,000,000 of people, "mostly fools." New Mexico is a country of 114,000,000 square miles, and 135,000 people, mostly Mexicans. Here the Mexicans live in all their ancient primitiveness and good-for-nothingness. They constitute about two-thirds of the population. There are possibly 50,000 white peoble in the Territory. Mexicans are not spoken of as white people, for the very good reason that they are not white. They are generally as dark as mulatros and sometimes as white as quadroons. Those of Indian mixture —that is, recent mixture—have straight Indian hair. Those of the more pronounced Spanish type have dark, curly hair. And yet, with dark complexions, dark eyes, and dark hair, you rarely see a real handsome man or woman. They live poor and look poor. People generally look the way they live.

The Mexican masses live in adobe houses—called doby houses out here—that is, houses built out of brown mud. They mix this mud with a few small stones sometimes, but not often. It is quite often mud bricks, about three times the size of our bricks, dried in the sun and laid in the wall two feet thick. Nearly all of them are one story houses. Many of them are built, like a fort, several families living in their different compartments, and having a common courtyard and placeta.

The Indians call their hamlets pueblos, while the Mexicans call them placetas. They live on the floors, of their houses, and the floors, like the walls are simply "doby," or earth. Go in and out where you will, you nearly always find the women and children squatting on the floor. I suppose that the large majority of Mexicans sleep on the ground and eat on the ground and live on the ground. As a race they seem to have been born tired. They are a great people to sit and lie down. In this respect, as well in their general style and manner of living, they seem to be near akin to the Southern negro. They have but little more get up and get in them. Very few of them can speak English. They have a Spanish patois of their own. And yet they are a very polite people. You can venture to go into their houses when visiting places with impunity. They salute you with a nod and a smile, And if you can speak a few words of Spanish, as for instance, "buenos dias" (good day) they are ever so much pleased And when you leave they salute you with an "adios" (goodby).

The Mexican poor, and nearly all of them are mighty poor, live on less than any people in America, not excepting the Chinese. They can, for instance, make a meal on a little grease mixed with red peppers. Red peppers seem to be a stample article of diet with them, and you will see strings of peppers on the sides of their "no-ys" just as you will see strings of garlic in the French market in New Orleans. They call them "chilly," and chilly is omnipresent in their diet. A Mexican is content to drive three or four barros into town (little jacks and jennies loaded with pinon wood, representing perhaps a week of work—and this he sells for two bits a burro-load—and with the proceeds he buys a sheep's head or two or some equivalent in the way of meat, and then feasts for a week on chilly soup. Their poor diet is the reason, so it is said, why they are so small, delicate and weak as compared with the whites. They only get about half the pay for work that white men do. A boss carpenter told me that he paid Americans $4 and $4 50 per day, and Mexicans $2.25 and $2 50.

By the way, this boss carpenter is a German named Joseph Thielen, from Guaymas (pronounced Wymas), Mexico, down on the Sonora Railroad, on which he is a division boss, and he is refugeeing here from the yellow fever. He says that the Mexicans are the greatest gamblers on earth—exceeding the Chinese if possible—and that as soon as they get their pay on paydays they proceed to spread a blanket and bet their money. Hence they are always hard up, and frequently they will sell their pay ahead at a shave of 50 per cent. to get gambling-money. And you would suppose they were a very religious people. Even here in New Mexico they have an adobe church in their adobe placetas. And curious old structures these churches are. There is a placeta near here that boasts a church two hundred years old. It hasn't a seat in it and never had. The women sit on the ground during service and the men stand. The door is very ancient and opens in two sections. A man goes up a ladder to the roof to ring the bell. The bell is swung on a cross-timber built into a gable of dobe.

HYGIENICS.

Ways of Retaining or Regaining Health.

Methyl salicylate (oil of wintergreen) mixed with an equal quantity of olive oil or linimentum saponis, applied externally to inflamed joints affected by acute rheumatism, affords instant relief, and, having a pleasant odor its use is very agreeable.—Therapeutic Review.

Dr. George R. Shepherd of Hartford says in respect to the use of hot water as a remedial agent in the treatment of inflammation of the mucous membranes: "I have used hot water as a gargle for the past six or eight years. In acute pharyngitis and tonsilitis, and in coryza, or cold in the head, if properly used in the commencement of the attack, it constitutes one of the most effective remedies, being frequently promptly curative. To be of service it should be used in considerable quantity (a half-pint or a pint at a time), and just as hot as the throat will tolerate. I have so many cases of acute disease thus aborted, and can commend the method with great confidence."

The latest agent introduced for the relief of neuralgia is a one per cent. solution of hyperosmic acid, administered by subcutaneous injection. It has been employed in Billroth's clinic in a few cases. One of the patients had been a martyr to sciatica for years, and had tried innumerable remedies, including the application of electricity no fewer than two hundred times, while for a whole year he had adopted vegetarianism. Billroth injected the above remedy between the tuber ischii and trochanter, and within a day or two the pain was greatly relieved, and eventually quite disappeared. It would be rash to conclude too much from these results, in the face of the intractability of neuralgia to medication, but if it really prove to be as efficacious as considered, hyperosmic acid will be a theraputic agent of no mean value.—Lancet

The nerves and brain will not work well when there is any pressure on them. Pressure on the main nerve of a limb alters its conducting power, and causes a sensation of numbness. For this reason all bands, shoes or articles of dress which constrict or press on the nerves of the skin, interfere with and diminish brain action in proportion to the amount of pressure. Women who wish to do the best brain work cannot be the devotees of fashion, but must dress rationally. Irritation of any nerve extremity prevents one from doing good brain work. A sliver in the finger, a toothache, a wound, or boil, will prevent fine study or thought. A certain amount of bodily heat is also necessary. When one is cold he cannot think well. Cold blooded animals have less active nervous systems than warm blooded ones.—W. L. Holbrook.

More quarrels arise between brothers, between sisters, between hired girls, between school girls, between clerks in stores, between hired men, between husbands and wives, owing to electrical changes through their system by lodging together night after night under the same bed clothes than by any other disturbing cause says the London Lancet. There is nothing that will so derange the nervous system of a person who is eliminative in nervous force as to lie all night in bed with another person who is absorbent in nervous force. The absorber will go to sleep and rest all night, while the eliminator will be tumbling and tossing, restless and nervous, and wake up in the morning fretful peevish, fault finding and discouraged. No two persons, no matter who they are should habitually sleep together. One will thrive, the other will lose. This is the law.

There are substances which, taken into the body, produce strange contrasts in respect to felicity and depression. Foods well cooked, foods carefully selected, foods supplied in sufficient quantity to sustain the body equally in all its parts, and so moderate as never to oppress the nervous digestive powers, all conduce to felicity in the most telling manner Many common foods and drinks affect the system specially. As a rule, all agents which stimulate, that is to say, relax the arterial tension, and so allow the blood a freer course through the organs, for a time promote felicity, but the reaction leave depression. The alkaloid in tea, theine, has this effect. It causes a short and slight felicity. It causes in a large number of persons a long and severe, and painful sadness. There are many who never know a day of felicity owing to this one destroying cause. In our poorest districts, among the poor women of our industrial population, our stocking-weaving women, the misery incident to their lot is doubled by this one agent.—Dr. B. W Richardson the North American Review

MONEY WITHOUT OWNERS

Singular Incidents that Come to th Notice of the Dead Letter Official

Washington Letter in the Cleveland Hera

While I was in the "Dead-Letter" D partment the other day one of t clerks engaged in opening letters—a table near by—called to the gentlem who was entertaining me. He went him and immediately beckoned for me follow.

"Now, what can be done in this ca he says. "Here is a letter, thi ins opened, and you see what it conta

There is a clean, new twenty-d bill, neatly folded and wrapped piece of perfectly blank brown pa not a mark of pen or pencil to from whom it was sent. The letter been advertised as unclaimed and dead, and the examination of its tents made it more completely than before.

"We have nothing but the post and even that is almost obliterated our expert will take hold of it ar the best he can with it There's a pret slim chance in this case. I guess Unc Sam will get the money. This remin me of something in my own experien A few years ago, when I was open letters, I found one just like this e cept that the amount was $50 and the paper, wrapper around it w written in pencil, A friend, Matthe vi.: 3.' I looked that up and found it be: 'But when thou doest alms, let thy left hand know what thy right ha doeth.' The letter was addressed to woman and it was clearly a case of ch ity. I really felt bad that we could succeed in the Treasury to-day.

Capture at the Boule Noire.

A Story of the Paris Secret Police.

The 15th of March, 1832 at nine o'clock in the evening, a cab stopped in front of the entrance of the ball of the Boule Noire. A man stepped out of the vehicle; he was about thirty-five years old, tall, thin, with an intelligent and bold face, slightly blonde mustache curled up and carefully tended, a jacket of black velvet, a soft felt hat a little on one side of his head, and Swedish gloves. Another man had been walking up and down on the footpath for the last quarter of an hour. He had on a frock-coat, buttoned up to the chin, a dirty dollar, ragged black necktie, large hat, heavy mustache, and whiskers cut squarely on his cheeks. He carried a heavy cane. The two men accosted each other, and in a rapid tone exchanged these words:

"This way, Dubrisart, this way."

"Marcou! Is it you who sent for me?"

"Yes; but there is too much light and too many people on the footpath. Let us cross the boulevard."

They crossed the street, and when they were on the other side, leaning against the wall of a whitesmith's shop that turns the corner of the Rue des Martyrs, Marcou, the man with the frock-coat, took Dubrisart's two hands in his and pressed them with effusion.

"Dubrisart, I am glad to see you again. You never come into our quarters now; you work in high politics; you go on foreign missions. I have been told of that. And when I think you began as a little auxiliary of no account in my brigade! I was your superior."

"And you are still my friend, my dear Marcou. I have had luck and protection."

"And then you have education and distinguished manners. There is not a man at the prefecture who knows how to dress as you do, not even the prefect himself. You belong to an honorable family. You speak English, so you were sent to England under the empire to see what was going on at La—Toni—Tiken, where the Orleans princes were."

"Twickenham."

"Yes, that's it. I, my dear fellow, have gone on vegetating in paltry service. But to-night I have a rather important affair on hand. In the course of the day a certain Aglae Ripon came to the prefecture. Ah! You don't know her? She's a celebrity at the balls and taverns about here. We were then—four or five of us—chatting around the stove. The woman came into the office furious, saying that she knew one of the chiefs of the commune—a man who had pillaged, shot, committed arson and done the whole thing in fact. Naturally, we asked Mademoiselle Ripon to take a chair. She came to offer to give up to us, this evening, at the Boule Noire, Stafner, who had been an officer under the commune."

"Stafner? The man who stabbed me in a little cafe at Belleville in 1860?"

"Yes; and it is because I know the story of that stabbing that I asked you to come. I don't know Stafner, and I thought that you would not mind helping."

"Gladly; and I shall recognize him, do not fear. He is to be at the ball to-night?"

"At ten o'clock."

"And Aglae Ripon?"

"Three of my men—Cervoisier, Pollat, and Chaulet—are going to bring her. They ought to be here already. When she had made her declaration she wanted to go away, but I did not lose the young lady. I know what woman's anger is—it goes up and down in five minutes. She had only to find her lover to feel a moment's remorse, to warn him, and our little plan would have been spoiled. She had a rendezvous with Stafner at ten o'clock this evening, and that was all I wanted. I told her that the government would pay for her dinner and a cab to go to the ball; but that she would not be allowed to go home until she had served us up Stafner. Ah! probably there they are. The cab is stopping on this side of the boulevard."

The door of a cab opened a few steps from Dubrisart and Marcou. Out of it came, accompanied by three policemen in plain clothes, a tall girl in a woolen dress, a cape of gray cloth, and a black hat with a big bunch of red roses hanging from the left side. One of the men came up to Marcou, while the two others kept a watch on the woman, who looked around her with an air of alarm.

"Monsieur," said the man, "you ought to speak to the girl. She alarms me. She would not eat any dinner. She has been crying in the cab. For certain, she regrets what she has done, and is afraid of what remains for her to do."

"I'll talk to her," said Marcou; and he went up to the woman.

"Listen," he said to her, "no nonsense, you know. You have your record at the Prefecture. I have been glancing over it to-day. There are some bad things in it, and if we wanted to send you to Saint Lazare for five or six months, we should not want pretexts. You know the house."

"You are wrong," said Dubrisart to Marcou; "you must never be brusque with a woman. Let me talk to her." And approaching Aglae Ripon, he said: "Listen to me, my pretty maid. If you are reasonable, we will take care of your reputation, and no one shall know that you gave up Stafner. We shall take you into the ball and you shall sit at a table by the side of the orchestra, near the little door that leads into the garden. You will remain there with these three gentlemen, and drink as much smuggled wine and smoke as many cigarettes as you like. The government will pay. This gentleman and myself will be in the garden. When Stafner arrives you will go up to him; if you try to lead him toward the street door our men will seize him, but they will not touch you; they will tell every body that you betrayed our man for fifty francs. But if you bring him quietly into the garden, we will pack off the pair of you. There will be no disgrace for you; you will be taken to the Prefecture; you will be set at liberty a quarter of an hour afterward, and you can finish your evening at Vauxhall or at the Elysee Montmartre. Do you understand? Yes? And you will be reasonable? That is right. Now go with these gentlemen; we will wait for you in the garden."

Aglae and the three policemen crossed the boulevard and entered the ball. Marcou and Dubrisart followed them, passed through the room, and went and sat on a bench at one end of the garden. The evening was cool, and the garden was deserted.

* * * * * * *

"I can offer you a fine cigar," said Dubrisart to Marcou; "I bought three or four excellent boxes at Antwerp."

"Ah! you have been at Antwerp?"

"Yes, three weeks ago for the Comte de Chambord."

"Do you travel much?"

"Since the 4th of December I am always on the move."

"You did not stay in Paris during the siege?"

"No; on September 5th I already saw what the government of the national defense was worth. Those gentlemen had the idea of keeping Paris without secret police. Lunatics, pure lunatics. As I was supposed to have a certain merit, I was the post of secretary to a police commissioner who had been newly appointed, and who could not perform his duties without assistance. I refused. I did not like sedentary parts. I said to myself: 'Some day or other the secret police will be reorganized, and I shall be wanted.' I left Paris with a company of sharpshooters. For two months we beat about in the forest of Orleans, and then went to Tours to recruit. It was about the middle of November. The first man I met in Tours, in the Rue Royale, was that Big Versac, who, before the 4th of September, was in the brigade of the Chateau, and who took me at once to the headquarters of the Surete-Generale. He told me, as we were going along, that Monsieur Gambetta was a man who had some idea of government; that since his arrival they were trying to reorganize a secret police, but that they were in great difficulties. The government of Tours found it easy enough to improvise prefects and generals; but they cannot improvise a police. That is where our force lies. They are always obliged to come back to us. They made me a very fair offer, and when they knew that I had been at Twickenham, at Baden, and at Woodnorton, to keep an eye on the Orleans princes, they said to me: 'That is capital. We know that the Prince de Joinville is hiding somewhere in one of the provincial armies. Try to find him.' So I went to seek the Prince de Joinville. It seemed to me odd to be doing the same business for the public as I had been doing for the empire for ten years. Ah! old fellow, we get to be philosophers after fifteen years of political police. The empire sent us to run after the Orleans princes. The republic sent us to run after the Orleans princes. The more it changes, you see, the more it is still the same thing. We caught the Prince de Joinville at last. It was in the army of the Loire that he was fighting against the Prussians. We kept him prisoner at the prefecture at Le Mans for five days, and then it was I who accompanied him to Saint Malo, when he took the boat for England. The fact is that our business is not monotonous. When I think, for instance, that I who am here talking to you in the garden of the Boule Noire—I arrested, January 13, 1871, the Prince de Joinville, at Le Mans, and, the 17th of July the same year, the painter Courbet, at Paris, hidden in a cupboard; when I think that I presented my respects to the Emperor Napoleon, at Chiselhurst, on January 18, 1872, and to the Comte de Chambord, at Antwerp, on the 24th of February following"——

"You have spoken to the Emperor and to the Comte de Chambord?"

"As I am speaking to you, Marcou. At Chiselhurst it was nothing to boast about; you left your name and address with the gate-keeper, and the following day you received a letter of audience. I had arranged for myself a nice little Bonapartist story: 'My grandfather, captain in the Imperial Guard, killed at Waterloo,' etc. We were received one Sunday, after mass, in a batch of ten or twelve. We all entered together a little blue saloon on the ground floor, and whom did I see at the Emperor's side? Our former chief, Pietri. Then when my turn came to say a few words I made up a phrase about the state of Paris, where there was neither security nor police. I added that everybody regretted the empire and the administration of Monsieur Pietri. The emperor smiled as I was going out. Monsieur Pietri came and shook me by the hand, and said to me that I had spoken like a good Frenchman.

"My campaign at Antwerp was more difficult. They had sent for me at the Prefecture and had told me to go to Antwerp and see what was going on there. I asked permission to fix my own day and hour of departure, and to be allowed to act as I thought proper. They gave me the authorization, and it was agreed that there should be no questions asked about my expenses. Five or six persons were sent to Antwerp. I allowed my comrades to start, and I set off on February 22d. The pilgrimage to Antwerp was then at its prime. I arrived in good time at the Northern Railway station. I examined the passengers as they came in, I said to myself: 'The train starts at seven in the morning and arrives at Antwerp at three in the afternoon. I must choose my compartment carefully, get into conversation with my fellow-passengers, and have some sponsors when I arrive at Antwerp. For that I have eight hours. It is more than enough.'

"I was, as you may imagine, irreproachably dressed. I had taken with me, as my valet, Versac; you know Versac, whom I found at Tours. We are great friends now, and always work together. He is a clever fellow, but he prefers minor roles, where there is no responsibility. He was, too, well repaid for his journey. He fell in with a charming little Legitimist chambermaid, and she told him heaps of things about one of the greatest houses in the Faubourg Saint Germain. Versac is a handsome man, he won her affection, and he found her when he returned to Paris, and so we have a good door open there.

"At the station I saw an old gentleman with a lady of some thirty years of age, not pretty, but very agreeable. I looked at them. I said to myself: 'That is my affair,' and I got into their compartment. I was not mistaken. They were going to visit the king—once in the train, you know, we said not the Comte de Chambord, but the king! At the station of Luzarches we exchanged our names and titles. The old gentleman was named the Marquis de Bonstasson. I called myself the Baron de Martonne de Lustrac. Besides my Bonapartist story I have a legitimist story, which is connected very adroitly and in a very complicated manner with two names of extinct families. At Creil I learnt the name of the young woman. She was the daughter of the old marquis and widow of the Comte de la Riballiere. Between Creil and Compiegne the old marquis told me his history. Between Compiegne and Tergniers I related to him mine. I was a Frenchman from beyond the seas, who had come over for the war with the volunteers of Montevideo. At Tergniers we breakfasted at the same table, the marquis, the countess, and myself. At Antwerp we put at the same hotel, and in the evening Versac took our two requests for an audience to the Comte de Blacas at the Hotel Saint-Antoine. The marquis in his letter had spoken of me, and I in mine had spoken of him. I was no longer alone. I had a sponsor! A marquis, with long, silvery hair, and a majestic and venerable air. In short, I assure you, the best there was in the train.

The following day we were received, all three of us, at the Hotel Saint Antoine, in a series of twenty to twenty-five persons. We were introduced in patches, as at Chiselhurst. When the king entered, there was great emotion. The old marquis, especially, was as if he had been crushed. He fell on his knees, and they had all the trouble in the world to raise him up. He wanted to kiss the king's hand. He began to ramble in his talk, to say that now he could die, etc. We brought him back to the hotel where we had put up. He took to his bed, and I and the countess passed the evening with him. Eight or ten persons who were in our batch came to ask after the health of the old marquis. The next day we returned all the visits we had received. I remained at Antwerp until the departure of the king, and saw a great many people. I returned with a report and notes which did me much honor. And if I had a little fatuity, I might even add that the countess had a way of leaning on my arm and looking at me sideways when we went to see the pictures in the museum at Antwerp—— Ah, I might, perhaps, have made a very fine marriage!"

"Monsieur Marcou, the man has come, and the woman is bringing him into the garden."

At these words, uttered by one of the policemen, Dubrisart and Marcou rose, traversed the garden, and remaining on the door-sill, looked into the dancing-room. They saw Aglae Ripon coming along the circular promenade on the arm of a little red-haired man in a grey coat and wearing a soft felt hat. The little man was talking much and seemed very animated. The woman did not seem to be listening. Her gait was uncertain, her glance vague. She must have drunk a great deal of sugared wine. By a mechanical gesture of her left hand, she almost constantly pushed back the bunch of red roses that beat against her face. The two policemen followed.

"Do you recognize him?" said Marcou to Dubrisart.

"No; he wore all his beard; he had dark hair. I see before me a beardless man with red hair. But we shall soon see; I have certain means of knowing if it is he."

When the woman saw the garden door, and when she recognized Marcou and Dubrisart, who were waiting on each side of the door, she drew herself up, screamed, and tried to rush back. But the policemen seized both the man and the woman and pushed them violently into the garden. Marcou shut the door. At that moment the quadrille finished, and five hundred voices cried furiously, "Encore, encore!"

"Let the woman go," said Dubrisart, "and bring the man here under the gas-lamp. Then—and now, my friend, show me your left hand. Open it. Ah! there are my three teeth. It was I who gave you those three marks in exchange for a cut from your knife. Handcuff him. It is Stafner."

* * * * * * *

Dubrisart and Marcou arrived at the Prefecture at half-past ten that evening. One of the chief detectives was there. They gave him an account of their expedition.

"Very good," he said. "Marcou, I thank you; but you, Dubrisart, remain. I have a question to ask you. I have had several reports about the reception at Antwerp. In one of my reports a Baron de Martonne de Lustrac is mentioned as having been very violent in his language. He spoke most insultingly in public concerning Monsieur Thiers. You did not see this Baron de Martonne de Lustrac?"

"Yes, I saw him."

"Well, you say nothing about him in your report. Why?"

"Because it was myself."

"I thought so. And this is what comes of our fantastic police, without orders or discipline. At every line in your report you speak of a Comtesse de la Riballiere."——

"Yes, who was very fervent, and whose father."——

"The Marquis de Boustasson. Yes, I know. Wait a minute."

The chief opened a door.

"Madame Robert," he said, "will you come in, if you please?"

And the Baron de Martonne de Lustrac saw the Comtesse de La Riballiere enter, dressed in the most modest fashion. Both of them, the baron and the countess, looked at each other astonished.

"Monsieur Dubrisart, Madame Robert; Madame Robert, Monsieur Dubrisart. Look at each other well, I pray you, and be good enough when you meet not to practice your secret police against each other."

Dubrisart and Madame Robert left the chief's office, and while they were going down one of the staircases of the Perfecture, Dubrisart said:

"There is only one thing that puzzles me—it is the old marquis. He has a positively noble air. Where did you discover him?"

"He is my father," replied Madame Robert; "he used to be an actor. He was perfection in the roles of noble fathers."—Ludovic Halevy.

Gen. Badeau on Sheridan.

Gen. Badeau, in Century for the current month, says of Sheridan at West Point:

A vacancy occurring at West Point when he was seventeen, Sheridan applied to the member of congress from his district for the appointment. The answer inclosed his warrant as cadet, and directed him to report at West Point, June 1, 1848. He brushed up his spelling and grammar, and passed his preliminary examination without trouble. When he entered the academy he knew nothing of algebra, geometry or any of the higher branches of study. But Cadet Henry W. Slocum, since major general of volunteers and member of congress from New York, was his room-mate. Slocum was an industrious, hard-working student, and from him Sheridan derived much assistance, especially in the solution of knotty points of algebra. The two boys were very much in earnest and after taps, when the lights were put out and every cadet was expected to remain in bed, Slocum and Sheridan were in the habit of banging a blanket over the window, and then pursuing their studies. At the first examination Slocum went up toward the head of the class, and Sheridan stood several files higher than he had expected with his disadvantages. In 1852, in his graduating year, he had some trouble of a belligerant sort with another cadet, which resulted in his suspension. He thought at the time the punishment was unjust but riper experence convinced him that the authorities were right and he was wrong. He was suspended for a year, after which he joined the class of 1853, and in this he was gryduated.

University Journalism.

One of the most interesting and valuable features of Johns Hopkins University library is the newspaper bureau. Prof. H. B. Adams refers to it in a lecture as follows: "A trained editor and a staff of assistants read all the representative dailies, mark superior articles upon economic, political, social, educational, legal and historical subjects. These are afterwards clipped and arranged in newspaper budgets, kept in large envelopes or oblong boxes. These are marked with labels, and the list of subjects includes everything of value that finds its way into the columns of the press. Bulletin boards are covered daily with the best clippings from the latest papers, arranged under the leading heads of current topics. The classification and preservation of the best articles on economic, social and political topics are not only valuable for the coming student, but are useful to the student of to-day. How often does one wish that he had saved the report of some important political discussion, a Mayor's message, a department report, divorce statistics and those many facts and illustrations that he could work into the warp and woof of his student's tasks if he but had them at hand! It is idle to sneer at present politics. The best energies of our time are revealed in the newspaper and in political discussion."

PROFIT AND LOSS.

Philis, much more wise than fond,
Thinking no game comes amiss,
One day extracts from Phillimonde
Thirty sheep for just one kiss.

But the next day comes a change—
He will win his will more cheap,
And he now extracts from her
Thirty kisses for one sheep.

Next day Philis, grows more kind,
Anxious is her love to keep,
So she, with contented mind,
For one kiss gives all the sheep.

Next day, Philis, wise in vain,
Would give sheep and dogs as well
For the kiss the fickle swain
Gives for nothing to Arbelle.

One Long-felt Want Unfilled.

From the Salt Lake (Utah) Herald.

In common with other communities, one of Utah's wants is a new kind of a boy. The physical pattern of the average boy of the period is good enough, in fact, is so nearly correct that very little improvement in this respect could be suggested. What we want in the new boy is an improved mental and moral organization. We want a kind of a boy that is not afraid of work. By work we do not mean to confine the word to running on errands, serving as cash boys, standing behind a dry goods counter and smiling blandly on lady customers, nor to adding long columns of figures, nor to writing a fair hand in addressing envelopes. These are all important and necessary labors, and are as honorable and praiseworthy as any others. But all the boys cannot be cash boys, messengers and book-keepers, and it is a remodeling of those who cannot do those things that is desired. Where there is one lad who finds porfitable and light employment there are 20 who require to learn the work and overcome their aversion to labor. We want a race of boys who know something of the hammer, the saw, the plane, and the composing stick, boys who are not afraid to soil their hands with forge cinders or printer's ink; boys who can dig and delve, who can handle the pick and shovel, and trowel, who can roll a wheelbarrow, plow, sow, and reap; who can build and produce. Parents may do much in the matter of bringing upon the field of action the improved boy by teaching their lads that the noblest aspiration in this life is the ambition to do something and be something. Teachers also can help along by teaching boys that it is just as honorable and praiseworthy to shove a plain or swing a hammer as it is to measure tape and calico, and that it is positively disgraceful to loiter about the streets waiting for an easy job.

A Vermonter at Gettysburg.

E. B. Andrews of Richmond, Vt. writes as follows: A very amusing anecdote is told of Private Jones of the 14th Vermont Volunteers. On the third of July, at the battle of Gettysburg, the second brigade was in the union line on the brow of the hill. Few of its members had ever seen a battle. Some time before the terrific cannonading commenced in the afternoon, the aids were riding in every direction carrying orders from their superiors. Jones was heard to say several times, "I wish I was a big man that I might ride a horse like these officers." Not long after the shelling opened from a hundred guns on the Union line, preparatory to Pickett's grand charge. The Vermonters were hugging the ground with but a slight breastwork of rails in front of them. The shells were bursting about and around them in every direction. George Burnham, a good deal of a wag, said to Jones, "Don't you wish you were a big man, that you might ride a horse?" "No," says Jones, "I wish to G—d I wan't bigger than a pismire." The total loss in this battle of the brigade was 348, and of the 14th regiment 107.

Mrs. Fred. Douglass.

Speaking of the marrige of Frederick Douglass, the Rochester Democrat says: "Mrs. Douglass is the daughter of Gideon Pitts, of Honeoye, in the town of Richmond, Ontario county, and is a very intelligent lady, of spotless character. Mr. Pitts was an original abolitionist, and a man of the most sterling worth and of large influence in his community. In Honeoye, at an early day, abolition conventions were of frequent occurence, and many of the ablest anti-slavery orators have spoken there, and thus the place was educated not only in anti-slavery ideas, but received an intellectual culture of a high order as well, which has rendered it not only intelligent, but has also freed it from many of the prejudices of caste. It was in such a community and amid such influences that Mrs. Douglass was educated, and it is not surprising that she has the courage of her opinions."

Personal Matters.

Stephen A. Douglas, Jr. is in Florida visiting his uncle, Judge Thomas Settle, at whose home in Rockingham county, North Carolina, he lived for much of the time during several years following the war in company with his brother, Robert M. Douglas, now United States marshal for that district. Stephen was then studying law, and in 1869, when he was only nineteen, he was made a member of Govenor Holden's staff and appointed brigadier general of militia during the campaign against the Kuklux Klan. In person, he is stout, and he is popular as a public speaker.

A physician in Brentwood, Tenn., bearing the frigid name of Jack Frost has sued Mr. James Knox Polk Hill and his wife for $20,000 damages, the latter for alleged breach of promise of marriage and the former for breach of confidence in effecting his own marriage with the co-defendant, who at the time was a widow. Frost alleges that he commissioned Hill as his best man to bring the widow down to Nashville to marry him, and supplied him with a horse and buggy for the purpose, and, moreover, fitted him out with a new hat for the journey, and gave him a good dinner before he started, and that Hill then basely married the woman himself.

Isaac Maddy, aged thirty-one, was buried at Middletown, Missouri, the other day. The cause of his death was Addison's disease, so rare that but few instances of the same are on record. Five months since he began to turn black, and became as dark as any negro of that peculiar color. The change was the wonder of the community and the puzzle of physicians, until one better versed than the others pronounced it Addison's disease. The last known case was a lad at Greenville, Ohio, and it attracted the attention of the entire western medical fraternity. Mr. Maddy had been frequently examined by physicians, who were keenly disappointed when he faded and died, and no post mortem was allowed to be held. Mr. Maddy was a highly respected citizen of Middletown.

The average age of French generals is under forty-five; of English, over sixty-five. The average age of American generals depends a good deal on whether they are breathing the health-giving air of the West fighting Indians, or languishing in the malarial "Tom and Jerry" of Washington.

The Grants in Clover.

New York Letter in the Hartford Times.

I see, by the way, that one of General Grant's sons, Ulysses, Jr., has been getting a $150,000 house. The one the head of the family occupies cost $110,000. Soon after Jesse Grant married the daughter of Ex-Senator Chaffee he received his father-in-law's house, worth about $75,000. Whether Fred Grant has a fine house of his own or not, I can't at the moment say. But the Grants have certainly done well in New York. No other family has done as well in so short a time. Both financially and socially they are very near the top. Two-thirds of the social leaders think it a very great honor to have any of the Grants at a dinner or a reception, and possibly it is. Anyway, the lustre of the name goes very far.

There are a few particularly select circles, however, to which these excellent people have not yet been admitted, circles which regard them in the light of parvenus, and probably will not open to them till they are a generation older. These circles—quite limited—have more capital in blood than in money and examine all new-comers with a microscope.

Land Owner's in England.

The following fresh statistics in regard to the ownership of land in Great Britain will prove interesting reading: Twenty-eight dukes in the United Kingdom possess 158 separate estates, comprising nearly 4,000,000 acres. The other members of the peerage, 497 in number, holding 1,485 separate estates, embracing about 10,000,000 acres. Of 33,000,000 acres in England and Wales, more than 17,000,000 are owned by a body of men which possibly does not exceed 4,500. According to Hon. George Brodrick, warden of Morton College, Oxford, nearly half the enclosed land of England and Wales is owned by about 2,220 persons. The largest landed proprietor amongst the peers is the Duke of Southerland, who owns more than 1,000,000 acres. His rent-roll, however, is not so large as that of some peers with much less property, his income from land amounting to only $656,875, while that of the Marquis of Bute, who owns only 1 6,000 acres, is considerably more than $1,000,000. The duke of Buccleuch comes second to the Duke of Sutherland in number of acres and second to the Marquis of Bute in size of income. His land comprises 459,550 acres, and his rent-roll is about $1,100,000. The Duke of Northumberland's rent-roll ranks next, being $880,000, and next to him comes the Duke of Devonshire, with about $25,000 less. The Earl of Derby and Earl Fitzwilliam receive rents amounting annually to about $700,000. Altogether, there are ten peers who each receive over $500,000 a year from land.

A Life of Adventure.

The English General Gordon, whose achievements in China and Soudan have won a durable place in history, has led a life full of adventure and stirring incidents. At Woolwich, where he was entered for the royal engineers, he was rebuked for incompetence and told he would never make an officer. He resented this by tearing his epaulets from his shoulders and throwing them at his superior's feet. He obtained a commission and shortly after distinguished himself in the Crimean war. In the great Tarping rebellion in China Gordon assumed command of the emperor's forces and won every battle. Always foremost in a charge, Gordon carried no weapon, having only a cane which he used to direct the movements of his troops. This cane the Chinese believed was a magic wand, and this idea was of immense service. In 1874 he was engaged by the khedive to deal with the Soudan difficulties. His five years, work in this country put an end to the slave traffic and paved the way for the emancipation of the Soudan slaves in 1880.

Some of the Salaried Men.

The highest fixed salary drawn by Federal servants on duty in this country, excluding the President, is $13,000. This is paid to the General of the Army and the Admiral of the Navy. The Lieutenant-General of the Army gets $11,000. Vice-Admiral of the Navy $9,000. The major-Generals get $7,501 and the Brigadier Generals $5,500. It is curious to note that the Collector of the Port in New York receives $12,000—a larger salary than is drawn by his superior in Washington, the Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary of the Senate gets more than a Senator. He draws $6,000 yearly, while the Senators get only $5,000 apiece. The official stenographers of the house, whose duties are more difficult and arduous than those of the average member, recieve the same salaries as Representatives, but they are required to employ their own assistants, and therefor do not net over $3,500 per year

John Barleycorn's Victims.

George H. Butter. who has been there say there are several clergymen of various denominations in the Inebriates' Home at Fort Hamilton, a village on New York bay. Their craving for liquor is as great as that of anyone belonging to the meaner professions of medicine, law, journalism and negro minstrelsy When they first go in neither alcohol, bay rum, cologne, Florida water or hop bitters are left within their reach. Any form of bugle paint, which is also aptly called coffin varnish," is snapped at by your true dipsomaniac. The Home is more like a hotel than an asylum. The prices range from $14 to $50 a week for pay patients, the larger sum securing a suite of rooms and a private table. Merchants, artists, lawyers, doctors and literary men meet in the billiard and drawing rooms, or stroll about the shaded grounds chatting over their mixed experiences and consulting how to escape the yoke of John Barleycorn.

Personal Sketches of American Writers.

Harper's Bazar gossips as follows about certain well-known American writers: Miss Blanche Willis Howard is reported to be a magnificent blonde of generous proportions, with hazel eyes. Miss Phelps is tall, dark-haired, with long features, facile mouth, and sympathetic deep blue eyes. Nora Perry has a petite and finely modeled figure, clear gray eyes, and luxuriant gold-colored hair. Miss Alcott is very tall and stately, with thick dark hair, bluish-gray eyes and strong features. Mrs. Burnett is of medium height, and inclining to embonpoint. Her hair is a reddish gold, her frame large, and her face lighting up in conversation. Dr. Howells is short and rotund, dark and handsome, with an iron gray mustache and careless dark hair. Mr. Aldrich is fair and slender; his expression is fastidious, his profile fine; his mustache is blonde, with waxed ends. Henry James is of medium height and stout, with dark brown eyes and ruddy complexion; he is slightly bald, and resembles the Prince of Wales. Julian Hawthorne is tall, and large, hazel-eyed and handsome, with some slight resemblance to his father. John Boyle O'Reilly is very dark, eagle-eyed, with finely-cut fortures.

HOUSE, FARM AND GARDEN.

Farming Paragraphs.

It takes 250 bushels of potatoes to make a ton of starch.

Dr. B. G. Northrup, Clinton, Conn., has aided in organizing nearly 200 associations for village improvement.

A Kensington milk-dealer was lately compelled by English justice to pay $25 for extending his stock with 30 per cent. of water.

Strawberries grown in the open air have appeared in the Savannah, (Ga.) markets.

Some one has said that thorough tilling of the ground is equivalent to moving it 150 miles further south.

Fowls that can have the sun a few hours each day, with plenty of food, clean water and a dry dust bath, will often continue to lay through the winter; and as an egg at that time is equal in value to three in summer, will give their owner a much larger annual profit, while the additional care barely appreciable.

A Prairie Farmer correspondent reports a conversation overheard on the cars between two well-known Illinois agriculturists—Mr. S. G. Minkler, of Oswego, and Mr. A. R. Whitney, of Franklin Grove—in reference to the best time to cut timber: "Minkler would rather have one post from a tree cut down in August than four from the same tree felled at any other time of year.' 'So would I,' echoed Whitney. 'I have ladder-rounds from soft maples cut in August, 1863, that have been in use ever since, and none of them have broken. I have rounds in ladders made from wood cut two years ago, in May, and half of them are already broken. For any use about the farm I want my timber from trees cut in August.' Minkler said: 'If I could not cut my trees in August I would take time to girdle them then, and cut them at leisure. This I mean especially of all soft-wooded trees.'"

Hints to Housekeepers.

Nitric acid applied to warts will remove them.

Sealing wax is becoming popular with those who send out dainty social notes.

Loosen screws and nuts by pouring on the thread a little kerosene.

The Rats.—If Cayenne pepper is sprinkled plentifully in the resort of rats, they will resent the inhospitable treatment and will retire from the premises.

To polish windows or mirrors, simply breathe on them and then rub lightly with soft newspaper.

Flannels that have become yellow may be restored to whiteness by soaking them in a solution of soap, ammonia and water. Wash them in clean water.

Loosen ground glass stoppers by wrapping around the neck of the bottle a thick rag wet with hot water. Remove the stopper before the heat reaches and expands it.

Flour dough sweetened, seasoned with cayenne pepper and baked, if placed within the reach of mice, will clear the house of these rodents.

A dainty pocket case for cards is formed out of a piece of bristol-board four and one-fourth inches long and five inches wide, and pieces of silk and satin the same length and double the width. Fold the board, cover with the satin, and line with the silk, folding in the silken slips for the reception of the cards. Paint or embroider the outer surface.

A very pretty blanket for the baby's carrage is made of blocks about six inches square, of scarlet and white worsted, crocheted in afghan stich: on the scarlet block work some little figure in white. The white block may be ornamented or not, just as you please.

Tooth Powder.—Take one-half ounce of powdered chalk, one-half ounce of cream of tartar, one drachm of powdered myrrh one drachm of orris root, and two drachms of powdered bark. Mix all together and bottle it, keeping it closed.

Grease spots may be may be removed from wall paper by putting clean blotting paper over them and pressing it with a flat-iron.

A Hint as to Beds.—Those who find an excelsior mattress too hard, feathers too warm and a hair mattress too expensive, may make a feather bed very comfortable by laying a piece of straw matting covered with cotton cloth upon it.

Black kid gloves are sometimes a source of annoyance on account of little white streaks at the seams. This trouble may be diminished by coloring a little salad oil with black ink, then rub this over the white place with a feather; dry quickly outside the window.

Cleaning Mirrors.—The best way to clean mirrors, the glass of pictures, &c., is to take a soft sponge, wash it well in clean water, and squeeze it as dry as possible; dip in some spirits of wine, and rub over the glass; then have some powdered blue tied up in a rag, dust it over your glass and rub it lightly and quickly with a soft cloth; afterward finish with silk handkerchief.

To keep tins bright, take a small lump of washing soda, dissolve in water and add a little sand, then rub the tins briskly with it, using newspaper instead of a cloth. Polish off dry with dry newspaper. It is said that there is something in the printer's ink that aids in polishing.

Airy Basket.—Take white cloth, tear in strips about an inch wide, fringe it all but two or three threads in the center, then twist it and lay carefully one side until you get quite a pile of them fringed, then take a piece of wire, join the ends, wind with white cloth then sew your fringed strips in loops, or the first row let hang, and sew loops on the outside, tie a piece of bright ribbon close to the bottom to hold the pieces together. It is very pretty.

Window and Mantel Draperies.

One of the prettiest ways of draping curtains is to have them both long and full, the left one caught up by a loop of cord in the center but the right one caught up much lower down. Above the curtain on the left side is a second drapery or valance, looped back halfway between the top and the cord in the center. The curtains are crossed at the top so that the one that is hung on the right side falls on the left and vice versa. The effect of this arrangement is exceedingly good, but it is only possible in doorways or windows which have sufficient height and not too much breadth for the crossed curtains. Mirrors and chimney pieces are draped in a similar manner, and without crossing the curtains at the top. A deep valance falls from the mantel shelf and is draped in irregular fashion that taste and fancy may dictate. Light Indian and Chinese silks are frequently employed with good effect for draping the large mirrors which are no longer fashionable but cannot easily be taken down.

Courtesy.—William Wirt's letter to his daughter on the "small, sweet courtesies of life," contains a passage from which a deal of happiness might be learned: "I want to tell you a secret. The way to make yourself pleasing to others, is to show that you care for them. The world is like the miller at Mansfield, 'who cared for nobody' no, not he, because nobody cared for him. And the whole world will serve you so if you give them the same cause. Let every one, therefore, see that you do care for them, by showing them what Sterne so happily calls "the small, sweet courtesies," in which there is no parade; whose voice is to still, to ease; and which manifest themselves by tender and affectionate looks, and little kind acts of attention, giving others the preference in every little enjoyment at the table, in the field, walking, sitting, or standing."

Free and Easy Manners.

When girls assume a swaggering manner upon the street, use coarse expressions, and greet each other with a rough "Hello!" they cannot expect much deference from their male friends. A lady's manner always controls that of a gentleman; and if she does not respect herself he will not respect her. When boys and girls, young men and maidens, are allowed to fall into the absurdities of low, foolish, meaningless, talk, it seems to dwarf them intellectually; they can find nothing of interest or importance to say, and therefore make up for sense by filling every sentence with needless exclamations, exaggerations, or misused adjectives. It requires much patience to be compelled to listen to half a dozen folks and hear the strange inappropriate use of language. They will assure each other that it is "awful" warm, or the concert "awful" nice; the sermon "horrid" dull; a young lady is "awful pretty," but her dress "horrid ugly;" the teacher "horrid strict;" such a young gentleman who called had an "awful swell" team of fast horses. If young people could hear themselves as others near them, it might result in their reformation.—Home Circle.

Chief Points of Good Farming.

From the Aurora Cultivator.

A young farmer desires us to name the three great essentials of good farming in tillage, that by aiming at these he may be sure of success. In answer to his request it may be stated that there are more than three, any one of which being omitted there would be partial or entire failure; but perhaps the three most important of all would be—first, thorough underdraining; secondly, thorough cultivation, and thirdly, proper rotation. Nearly as important as any of these are the timely performance of the work of the season, and the use of manure or fertilizers. Taking them in the order in which we have named them—

1. Underdraining, on most soils, is indispensable. The only exception is on land which, having a porous subsoil, allows all surplus water from rains to sink away at once, leaving only what water the land will hold like a sponge. If superabundant water remains in the subsoil several days (which is easily known by observing how long it is held in post-holes or other small excavations) draining is required. Well drained land admits of cultivation early in spring, almost as soon as the frost disappears from it; undrained and water-soaked, it may be necessary to wait two or three weeks, or even longer; drained soil is warmed at once by sunshine; undrained is kept cold a long time in evaporating the water; drained soil becomes porous, admits air, and allows the manure to act at once on the growing plants; undrained excludes air from the soil, and the fertilizers remain locked under water and are of little or no use. Draining lengthens the season by allowing the working of the soil weeks sooner than if water-soaked. As a general rule, thorough tile-draining pays for its entire cost in three years in the increased crops, and sometimes in two years. Much land, supposed to be dry enough, is loaded with surplus water in spring a foot or two down when dry on top. This condition may be seen by digging holes in spring two or three feet deep, and observing how long water remains in them before evaporating or slowly soaking away.

2. A more common deficiency is a want of thorough pulverization. The fine roots of the plants cannot properly obtain food from hard clods and lumps. Finely reduced soils held moisture like a sponge, give it off as needed, and prevent drouth. Though mellowing of the soil has, in some instances, nearly doubled the wheat crop, and is especially useful for clay soils. A correspondent of the Country Gentleman stated some two years ago, as the result of many experiments, that one dollar in extra work with good pulverizing tools, added from five to ten bushels per acre to the wheat crop. Root crops have been doubled by reducing hard soils to fine powder in connection with the applied manure. One of the greatest and most important results of thorough culture is the prevention of the growth of weeds, and in giving clean and handsome fields, with large crops.

3. Rotation has the one great advantage of promoting success without additional expense. It consists in the exercise of the thought derived from experience. A proper succession of crops, with other essentials, gives heavy returns in all; while repetition of the same, or improper succession, tends to exhaustion or failure. A good, well-devised rotation tends largely to the exclusion of perennial as well as annual weeds.

These three points are indispensable. So is the use of manure, and hence the importance of saving and applying properly all that can be made. Waste by washing is to be avoided, and waste by applying and turning under in large lumps. Here the necessity of pulverization comes in. The timely performance of work is all-essential; a poor crop in a dry season, the growth of weeds, the waste or ripening products, and a general derangement of the whole machine may result from delay.

The preceding remarks apply to tillage.

The Second Empires.

Archibald Forbes writes in English Magazine: Perhaps in all history there is no episode so barren of touches of nature as was the second empire. From first to last it was a mere scaffolding of meretricious artificiality. There was the sham Cæsar, a flaccid person with a knack of uttering obscurities conveying a vague flavor of ominousness at which the nations pricked their sensitive ears. The inner life of the empire was a strange mixture of rottenness and gimcrackery. What a court! The atmosphere of Compiegne had a confused aroma of bastardy, the demi-monde, the bourse, bogus nobility, journalism in the degradation of prostitution, militaryism, half bravo, half gallant; of intrigue, of dissoluteness, of insincerity, of ghastly hollowness. It is among the most humiliating problems of modern times how long this nasty, gaudy caricature of empire was able to impose on the world. It is a poor consolation for the world's long self delusion that when the wind-bag was once resolutely pricked it should have collapsed with such headlong swiftness.

CROOKSTON, - MINNESOTA.

The excess of the value of exports from the United States over imports of merchandise for the month ended December 31, 1883, was $21,593,142; for the six months ended December 31, 1883, the excess was $61,988,665, and for the twelve months ended December 31, 1883, $108,071,684.

Henry Villard has written a touching letter to the Chamber of Commerce of St. Paul in response to an official expression of high personal application and of sympathy in his misfortunes. The grateful act of the Chamber was fully appreciated. It was an instance, somewhat rare, of bending sympathetically over a prostrate man, instead of kicking him. It pays to do such things in the long run—both in this world and in the world to come.

Beecher was charged in a newspaper with visiting Mrs. Langtrys's performance, but he pleads an alibi, that he was in Boston at the time stated, and suggests that he has a double who makes him trouble, and wants some one to "catch him, examine him in theology and make him preach, and so detect the rascal." Beecher does not go so far as to intimate that his "double" got him into "his great sorrow," as he calls it—the Tilton scandal.

A physician writes: "Water, to produce its medicinal effects, should be taken hot, not simply warm. It should be from 110 to 150 degrees Fahrenheit, or as hot as tea or coffee when first poured out. It should then be sipped slowly, so as not to distend the stomach. It should be taken an hour or so before each meal, and half an hour before retiring. About one-half pint should be taken at each time, making one quart during the twenty-four hours. It may be taken clear, or a little lemon juice or aromatic spirits or ginger or sage may be added."

Prof. Thompson, of Glasgow, says the magnetic pole is now more than a thousand miles west of the geographical pole. In 1657 the position of the needle showed the position of the magnetic pole to be due north. It had been eastward before that; it then began to point westward, and this westward variation continued to increase until 1816, when the maximum was attained; it has since steadily diminished, and in 1976 it will again point to the true north. The present whereabouts of the giddy thing is Boothia Felix.

Secretary Folzer, in his ardor directing the rupervising inspector of steam vessels to examine Mrs. Mary A. Miller of New Orleans, as to her qualifications as master of a steamboat, he says he knows of no reason why a woman, if skilled, honest and intelligent, hardy and prudent has not as good a right to command a steam vessel and navigate it as a man if she wants to. Woman having been put on God's footstool by the Great Giver of all good things, has a right to earn her bread in any honest way she may elect, and no man has the right to say her nay, no matter whether she worcs in skirts or breeches.

Govenor Bourne of Rhode Island, tells the people of this little State some plain truths about the growth of the divorce scandal. It seems that the ratio of divorces to marriages is constantly increasing, and already has reached the proportion of one divorce to nine and seven-tenths marriages. This ratio becomes, as the Governor says, "absolutely startling" when it is considered that probably a third of the population are Roman Catholics and therefore cut off from divorce entirely, since this would make the proportion among the rest of the people as high as one to every six or seven marriages. A large majority of the divorces were granted without opposition, and by collusion between the parties, upon ex-parte depositions. The ease with which the marriage tie is severed in Rhode Island has become so notorious that outsiders often go to the State and stay long enough to obtain the legal "residence" required, in order to procure divorces which they could not hope to get elsewhere.

In the United Staes the growing distance between the extreme of wealth and poverty is very great at all times, but it is never so strongly marked as in periods of commercial distress. While the cities are full of idle mechanics and laborers, and the scarcity of work is followed by low wages and suffering, the balls and parties of the rich are as magnificent as ever, and the sums lavished upon amusements and luxuries of all kinds are enormous. It is a state of affairs impossible to change greatly for the better but which no patriotic citizen can contemplate with pleasure. If there is any time when great wealth should be less ostentatious than another, it is when there is unusual sufferings among the poor and depression. A little more than a year ago, just before Christmas, there was a representation in a shop window of an eastern city at Christmas eve in the parlors of the rich, and in the hovels of the very poor. The contrast was extreme and horrible. Several thoughtful people protested to the proprietor that it was injudicious to harrow the feelings of the unhappy by such a contrast. The result was that one evening the windows were smashed and the representation destroyed by those who were stung to madness by exaggerated representations of life as it is. There is a lesson in this. Those who have wealth can enjoy it—all to themselves if so disposed—but should not flaunt it in the faces of the poor.

The commissioner of the general land office during the past week canceled forty-six fradulent land entries in Colorado, forty-one in Dakota, seven in New Mexico, two in Michigan and one in Minnesota.

Rear Admiral Edward Simpson will be appointed president of the naval advisory board, and Commodore S. R. Franklin superintendent of the naval observatory, upon the retirement of Rear Admiral Edward Shufeldt on the 21st inst.

Speaker Carlisle recently made the first selection under the new system of appointing stenographers, by appointing Andrew Devine stenographer for the committee on expenditures of the department of justice. Devine is one of the efficient stenographers removed by Speaker Keifer.

The president has approved the sentences of dismissal in the cases of First Lieut. William L. Clarke of the Twenty-first infantry, and First Lieut. Joseph F. Cummings of the Third cavalry, tried and convicted of the charge of duplicating pay accounts. An order will be issued from the war department dismissing them from the army.

A committee of fifteen citizens of Dakota appeared before the senate committee on territories to advocate the passage of the bill providing for a constitutional convention for the territory and to oppose the recognition of the recent convention at Sioux Falls, on the ground that it did not fairly represent the people of the whole territory.

Political gossips say that the refusal of the senate to confirm the nomination of T. B. Keogh for the marshal of Western North Carolina and Paul Strobach as marshal of Southern Alabama, is a severe blow of Senator Logan at the Arthur machine in the south, which is preparing to work up an Arthur boom in that latitude with an eye to results at the Chicago convention.

The subcommittee of the privileges and elections committee, appointed to investigate the causes which led to the death of Matthews in Copiah county, Miss., on the 8th inst., held a meeting and decided on their plan of action. They leave Washington on the 12th inst., for Hazelhurst, the county seat of Copiah county, and will decide as to proceedings on arrival. Sessions will be held at New Orleans and Jackson Miss.

The secretary of the treasury has approved the recommendation of Surgeon General Hamilton, that an immediate inspection be made of cities bordering on the Gulf of Mexico and the Carribean sea having commerce with the United States, in order that their actual sanitary condition many be known in advance of the yellow fever season. A medical officer of the marine hospital service, and a revenue marine officer will be detailed for the purpose.

The name of Mr. Green of North Carolina is evidently a misnomer. Under the innocent title of "A bill to encourage the cultivation of fruits" he introduced and induced Speaker Carlisle to refer to the committee on agriculture the following bill: "That it shall be lawful for any one to manufacture the apples, peaches, grapes, plums, berries and other perishable fruits, raised by himself or his tenants into brandy free from any internal revenue or restriction as now existing.

A bill was introduced in the senate by Hale providing for the payment to Lincoln H. Tibbets of Portland, Me., $10,000, in settlement of his claim for loss sustained by him in bringing back to New York in December, 1860, the cargo of the brig "Tornado," of which vessel he was the master, consisting of 8,000 kegs of gunpowder shipped from New York to New Orleans, by which action said cargo was prevented from falling into the hands of the authorities of the seceding states.

It is stated that when the coffin was opened it was discovered that the supposed inanimate body had turned upon its right side. The hair of the head had been torn out in handfuls and the fingers had been bitten from the bones. The body was reinterred and efforts made to conceal the case, but there are those who state that they saw the body and know the truth of the facts narrated.

A Desperate Minnesota Lunatic.

Brainerd, Special Telegram.—A messenger, just arrived from Nicholson for a surgeon, reports a fatal shooting affair at Ami Gould's ranch the 5th inst. A lumberman in Gould's employ loaded a shot gun after dinner and meeting Miss Minnie Loche, the sister of Gould's wife, deliberately shot her in the left side, breaking her left arm. He then started down the road and meeting Gould and a hired man with a load of hay, fired two shots at them without effect, they having covered themselves in the hay. After passing them he reloaded the gun and shot himself in the head, blowing his brains out and of course producing instant death. No cause is assigned by the messenger, who is unable to give the suicide's name, but says he was insane.

A Large Defalcation.

Troy, N. Y., Special—Henry S. Church, for nearly six years chamberlain of this city, disappeared on the 8th, leaving ostensibly for Springfield, Mass., on business. It was ascertained he was a defaulter, and an examination of his books shows a defaculation of $77,600, and it will poobably be much larger. A warrant has been issued, and a reward of $2,000 offered for his arrest. It is thought that Church lost much of the money in stocks, hoping to retrieve losses sustained in business. He took $8,500 of the city's money with him, and is supposed to have left the country. Mr. Church gave a bond for $50,000 when appointed, but did renew it when nominated for a second term. It is claimed, therefore, that the sureties are only liable for the amount of defaculation during his first term. Mr. Church was also a water commissioner. The common council confirmed H. Hall to succeed Mr. Church.

A Bad Newspaper Man.

Rockford, Ill., Special: The papers in the divorce suit of Laurie Porter vs. Robert P. Porter are now on file. The order of the court gives Mrs. Porter $10,200 and the custody of her two children. The entire sum has been paid over to Mrs. Porter and she is free once more and handsomely provided for. The public think the sum paid was none too large. The bill only alleges desertion, this being done, it is said, to save the children mortification when they grow up. An evening paper says: "It is generally believed that another woman was at the bottom of the trouble, and that while Porter lived in Chicago and wrote for the Inter-Ocean he left his broken-hearted wife for many long hours and spent the time with a brilliant literary woman. Mrs. Porter finally took her two children and came back to her father's home. It is reported that the literary woman followed him to Washington, and some say to Europe."

Dakotians in Washington.

At a meeting held on the 8th of Dakotians interested in the opening up of the great Sioux Indian reservation a committee consisting of Judge C. G. Moody, J. H. King, Barney Caulfield, A. G. Kellum, and Register Luse of Deadwood were appointed a committee to visit Senator Dawes, chairman of the Indian committee sent out last summer; Mr. Holman, chairman of the sub-committee on Indian appropriations; Secretary of the Interior Teller and Commissioner of Indian Affairs Price, with a view of securing concert of action. They have already visited Senator Dawes, who favors opening the reservation, but, at the instance of certain missionary societies, wants an extra appropriation for the benefit of the Indians in an educational way. This proposition is opposed by Mr. Holman, who favors the original agreement of last year. Secretary Teller and Commissioner Price are already committed in favor of the treaty, and it is very likely that if this cannot be concluded nothing can be done this congress.

The Starving Mille Lacs.

A communication written by Gov. Hubbard to Maj. C. C. Luce, Indian agent at White Earth, has been received at the interior department setting forth the deplorable condition of the Mille Lacs Indians. Gov Hubbard says: Information given me by ex-Senator Simmond of Little Falls, Minn., Joseph Roberts of St. Paul, and others regarding the condition of Indians at Mille Lacs leads me to request you to visit them and personally learn the truth about the situation, which I am led to believe is likely to become fatal to them and disgraceful to the government unless timely help be afforded them. Many of them are reported to be in a state of utter destitution. Their rice crop was a failure. Their act of violence in the destruction of the dam of the Pam river was a result of the anxiety and desperation which that failure caused them. They can make no sales of their hay because no loggers are going into the woods there. They have been unable to supply themselves even with deer meat because of the lack of snow. I am informed they have not received their annuities.

Gen. Sherman's Retirement.

Washington, Feb. 8.—The president to-day issued the following order, announcing the retirement of Gen. Sherman:

Gen. William T. Sherman, general of the army, having this day reached the age of sixty-four years, is, in accordance with law, placed upon the retired list of the army without the restriction of pay and allowances. The announcement of the severance from the command of the army of one who has been so many years its distinguished chief, can but awaken in the minds, not only of the army, but of the people of the United States, mingled emotions of regret and gratitude; regret at the withdrawal from active military service of an officer whose lofty sense of duty has been a model for all soldiers since he first entered the army in July, 1840, and gratitude, freshly awakened, for the services of incalculable value rendered by him in the war for the Union which his great military genius and daring did so much to end. The president deems this a fitting occasion to give expression in this manner to the gratitude felt toward Gen. Sherman by his fellow citizens, and to the hope that Providence may grant him many years of health and happiness in the relief from the active duties of his profession.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS.

Tuesday, February 5.

SENATE.—Some dissatisfaction has prevailed for sometime among senators in both parties with committee assignments which in pursuance of caucus agreement of both parties was settled by the appointment on additional committees under the new rule and the arrangement of some of the old committees.

On Additional Accommodation for the Library—Bayard, Morrill, Miller (Cala.) added, and Dolph retired.

Agricultural and Forestry—Sawyer and Gibson added.

Commerce—Dolph, Gorman and Slater added; Farley relieved.

Manufacturers—Pike and Butler added.

Mines and Mining—Bowen advanced to the chairmanship and Terry, Cullom, Jones (Fla.) added.

Woman Suffrage—Cockrell added and made chairman; Jones (Fla.) retired.

Claims—Fair added and Gibson retired.

The following have been named of members of the two new committees created under the new code of senate rules:

Expenditures of Public Moneys—Wilson, Harrison, Plumb, Platt, Beck, George and Kenna.

Fish and Fisheries—Lapham, Sewell, Dawes, Palmer, Morgan, Groome, Farley.

HOUSE.—The senate amendments to the tobacco bill was concurred in. A solution authorizing the committee on expenditures of the interior department to go to Hot Springs creek and investigate work thereon was rejected. The bill for the election of territorial governors and senators by popular vote was reported adversely. The bill to exterminate pleuro-pneumonia and create a bureau of animal industry was debated.

Wednesday, February 6.

SENATE.—The bill for the suppression and prevention of disease among domestic animals was reported favorably. Bills were introduced increasing the efficiency of the army and idemnifying Iowa under various acts relating to swamp and overflowed lands.

HOUSE.—Bills were introduced authorizing the purchase of snug harbors for disabled seamen, and for the establishment of a branch soldier's home in a western state. After the presentation of several resolutions of inquiry, the house passed to the consideration of the pleuro-pneumonia bill, and strong opposition to the measure was shown its opponents arguing from the state rights standpoint.

Thursday, February 7.

SENATE.—A mild sensation was created in the senate by Mr. Beck, who introduced a resolution directing the committee on civil service to investigate and report upon the discharge by the sergeant-at-arms of a colored employe named Dudley, who had been he said, a soldier in the war, and an efficient employe. Mr. Morrill attempted to bring up his bill to provide a building for the congressional library which brought down upon him a storm of objections. Mr. Morrill asked unanimous consent to make a few remarks upon the bill and then let the senate fix a day for its consideration. This was granted, and Mr. Morrill proceeded to read a carefully prepared argument in favor of the measure which occupied about forty minutes, during which time Senator Anthony fell asleep twice and the other senators read the morning papers and attended to their correspondence.

The following nominations were sent to the senate by the president. Consuls, Robert J. Stevens, Victoria, B. C.; Eugene O. Fechet, Michigan, Pasdel Porto; Philip Carroll, Palermy; Allen Francis, Port Stanley and Thomas, Ont.

HOUSE.—A resolution declaring vacant the positions of committee stenographers and providing another method for their employment was adopted. The rules of the house were considered, and during the debate Weller of Iowa assailed the Republican party and the national banking system, and Mr. Bedford made a reply. An amendment for a committee on woman suffrage was voted down by almost a party vote.

Mr. Wakefield of Minnesota has presented in the house of representatives the petition of 200 citizens of Southern Minnesota, asking congress for a full investigation of the facts in connection with the grant of land made by congress to Minnesota to aid in the construction of the Southern Minnesota railway, and for the forfeiture of so much of the grant as has not been earned in the time limited by law.

Friday, February 8.

SENATE.—A resolution was offered for a joint committee to investigate removals of employes of the two houses, and the reasons therefor. A bill for the relief of the American merchant, marine was reported from the committee on commerce. Bills were introduced creating a commission to investigate and report on the progress made by the colored people since 1865; and dividing Minnesota into two judicial districts. (Mr. Sabin). Debate ensued on the Greely relief bill, Mr. Ingalls sharply criticising the official action of the secretary of the navy in the premises, and Mr. Hale defending the secretary. The Mexican land grant titles bill passed. Adjourned till Monday.

HOUSE.—Reports were submitted in the contested election cases of Manning vs. Chalmers, Mississippi; and Garrison, vs. Mayo, Virginia. In the first case neither claimant is awarded the seat, and in the second the contested is favored. The report of the committee on rules was discussed and adopted. The naval appropriation bill was reported. A bill was introduced appropriating $10,000,000 annually for the common schools of the country. The bill providing for the muster and pay of certain officers and men of the volunteer service passed. A committee to investigate the Keifer-Boynton charges was announced. A joint resolution was presented appropriating $100,000 for sufferers from the floods in Ohio, Pennsylvania and West Virginia. Adjourned till the 11th inst.

A Startling Mining Episode.

Wilkesbarre, Pa., Special: The borough of Hazelton, in the lower part of this county, a city of 8,000 inhabitants, was thrown into a fearful state of excitement by the caving in of an entire square in the central part of the borough. The drop was about three feet, caused by the giving way of the timbers in the Sugar Loaf colliery underneath. Three of four houses including a hotel, were entirely wrecked, while numbers of others were more or less injured. The residence of Master Mechanic Clark, of the Lehigh Valley railroad shops, was utterly demolished. Fortunately, no lives were sacrificed nor anybody injured. It is reported that grave apprehensions exist in Hazelton concerning further settling of the surface. This is the first time the town is known to have suffered from a cavein directly in its business center.

Rewarding a Brave Man.

The Boston Post Publishing company has transmitted to Lieut. Rhodes, of the United States revenue cutter Dexter, a check for $2,053, the amount raised as a testimonial to his bravery in rescuing passengers from the wrecked City of Columbus. In accepting the gift Lieut. Rhodes suggests that he be allowed to distribute the fund among his brother officers and crew. The request was acceded to by the Post.

Ex-Judge Bleckley, of Georgia, lives alone in a little cabin on Screamer Mountain, in Rabun county, Georgia. Now and then a shepherd looking for lost sheep calls on him, and occasionally the Judge runs down to Atlanta. "I have the best of companions," he said the other day. "I have thirteen volumes of Herbert Spencer, three volumes of Gibbon's 'Rome' and nine volumes of Thoreau. I read Spencer when I want work, Gibbon when I want rest and Thoreau when I want recreation." Ill-health prompts the Judge to seek mountain air.

Ferdinand Wachtel, now singing tenor at Leipzig, is said to have provoked the bitter jealousy of his father. The latter, Theodore Wachtel, was a married man, driving a droschke, in Hamburg, when he discovered his talent. After his operatic successes he left his wife, or perhaps she left him, their two children going with their mother. One of those children is the tenor of Leipzig. The great singer, now the head of a second family lives in Berlin.

LOUISA M. ALCOTT.

Her First Story and Her First Five Dollars.

Mrs. Moulton, in a newly-published work on notable women, thus writes of Louise Alcott:

"Miss Alcott's first full grown romantic story was printed in "Gleason's Pictorial,' and for this she received five dollars. Ah, who of us scribes does not remember the pride and pleasure with which we received our first five dollars earned by literature; and why is a beginner's recompense always five dollars, no more, no less? This first published story appeared in 1851, when Miss Alcott was nineteen years of age. The next year she sent to the Boston Saturday Evening Gazette 'The Rival Prima Donnas,' which was accepted, and munificently, as it then seemed rewarded with ten dollars and a request for more. Nor was this all; for Miss Alcott herself dramatized the tale, and it was accepted by Mr. Thomas Barry, the manager of the Boston theatre. The play was never really upon the stage, owing to a disagreement about the distribution of the parts between Mrs. Barrow and Mrs. John Wood, then rival actress at 'The Boston.' In spite of this mischance, its author considered it a transcendent success; since for its sake, a free pass was given her, and she went to the theater forty times that winter. Think of the unmitigated rapture of those forty evenings to a very stage struck young lady!

"So strong, indeed, was Miss Alcott's passion at that time for acting that she made an engagement to appear upon the stage herself as Widow Pottle in 'The Jacobite,' and was anxiously awaiting for the night to be fixed when the friendly manager broke his leg, and in consequence his contract, and thus came to an untimely end the young girl's dream of dramatic glory.

"A farce, of her composition, was actually put upon the stage, and she tells me that she well remembers the wild beating of her heart as she sat on this glorious occasion in a stage box, holding an enormous bouquet, presented by a friend as stage struck as herself, and saw Mr. W. H. Smith, Josie Orton and Mr. Le Moine enact "Nat Bachelor's Pleasure Trip" for the benefit of Mrs. Smith."

"The Rival Prima Donnas' afforded Miss Alcott another glimpse of glory, which she herself described as follows:

"One of the memorial moments of my life is that in which, as I trudged to school on a wintry day, my eyes fell upon a large yellow poster with these delicious words:

"Bertha a new tale by the author of "The Rival Prima Donnas will appear in the Saturday Evening Gazette.

"I was late; it was bitter cold; people jostled me; I was mortally afraid I should be recognized; but there I stood, feasting my eyes on the fascinating poster, and saying proudly to myself, in the words of the great Vincent Crummles, 'This, this is fame!' That day my pupils had an indulgent teacher; for, while they were struggling with their pot-hooks, I was writing immortal works, and when they droned out the multiplication table I was counting out the noble fortune my pen was to earn for me in the dim, delightful future. That afternoon my sisters made a pilgrimage to behold the famous placard, and finding it torn by the wind, boldly stole it, and came home to wave it like a triumphal banner in the bosom of the excited family. The tattered paper still exists, folded away with other relics of those early days, so hard and yet so sweet, when the first small victories were won, and the enthusiasm of youth lent romance to life's drudgery."

Medical Gleanings.

A girl having died of diphtheria, her earings were cleansed in an ordinary way and given to her little sister, who had been purposely kept from contact with the patient during her sickness. In a few days the latter was taken with diphtheria which began in the punctured holes of the ears

In another case, the child had remained in good health while other members of the family were sick with diphtheria. But the child had a slight wound, over which a scab had formed. The scab by some accident was brushed from the wound, the raw surface imbibed the poison, and the child died of the disease.

The rate of mortality among convicts is fifteen per thousand in Maine, Massachusetts and Connecticut, twenty-five in Vermont, and twenty-six in New Hampshire. In Western Pennsylvania it is six; in Eastern, fourteen. In New York it is seven at Sing Sing, twelve at Auburn, and twenty at Clinton. In Wisconsin it is three; in Mississippi, seventy-seven! At the North the difference does not seem due to difference in management. Of course there is a cause, and it should be discovered.

A death from "soothing syrup" having lately occurred in Brooklyn, the coroner's jury recommended a law forbidding the sale of such medicines, unless as prescribed by a physician. We have no doubt that hundreds of deaths have been caused by these medicines. Most of them not so speedily as in this case, so that the cause was not so apparent. These syrups consist mainly of laudanum—the last drug that should be administered blindly to an infant.

A yearly examination of the eyes of two hundred and fifty-four students, from the beginning to the end of their college course, showed that ninety cases of short-sightedness grew to one hundred and twenty during this period and that nearly two-thirds of the cases increased in degree. The facts showed, contrary to previous belief, that the defect may originate in one up at least to the age of twenty. More than one-half of all graduates in this country as well as in Europe are short-sighted.—Youth's Companion.

The passenger rates on some railroads in this country are undoubtedly exhorbitant in some cases, but the average rate for all the lines—$2,33 for one hundred miles—is much less than the average for similar traveling accommodation in Europe, where first-class fare ranges from $2,34 in Norway and Belgium to $7 in Roumania. In Great Britain it is $3,41 to $5; in France $3.88; in Germany and Switzerland $3.11 or more; in Italy $3 50; in Greece $2,82, and in Turkey $5.66.

A leading lithographer of New York says enough money is paid yearly by insurance men, patent medicine dealers, theatrical men and merchants in the lithographic and chromo line to more than twice pay the national debt. It is estimated $250,000 will not pay for the calendars given away by the insurance companies this year, many of which cost as high as 60 cents a piece at wholesale.

A GRIST OF GRIEVANCES.

The Grand Forks Committee Present the Complaints of the Farmers to General Manager Manvel.

Mr. Manvel Replies to the Committee and Reviews the Charges, but Makes No Promises.

Pioneer Press.

The committee appointed at the Grand Forks convention of farmers arrived in St. Paul early this morning.

The committee called on Manager Manvel soon after their arrival and arranged for a meeting with him at 2 o'clock in the afternoon. The business of the committee was divided and the work of presenting grievances was allotted to different members. The claims of the farmers were presented by Mr. Anthony Garnett, and the business interests of the Red River Valley by Maj. Hamilton.

THE MEETING.

At 2 o'clock the committee were received by Mr. Manvel at the genera offices of the Manitoba road. The meeting was called to order by Maj. Hamilton, chairman, who gave a brief outline of the proceedings of the Grand Forks convention to present the grievances of the farmers of the Red River Valley to the officials of the Manitoba road and ask for such relief as could be afforded. The interview between Mr. Manvel and the business men of Grand Forks some time ago, gave them the hope that the difficulties which have been so long agitating the people of that section could be satisfactorily settled. That is the mission of the comittee. The interests of the railroad and the people of the valley are identical, and the fact has been demonstrated that there must be a change in the present policy of the road, or both would suffer. This committee does not come here in a dictatorial spirit, but rather as a supplicant to a friend to obtain relief from what they believe to be great wrongs.

THE FARMERS SIDE OF THE QUESTION.

Mr. E. D. Faulkner spoke for the farmers and presented their side of the case in a clear and logical manner. He said:

Mr. Pillsbury has represented, after his recent trip over the Manitoba road, that there was really no cause for complaint among the farmers and that they were getting better grades than he was able to get at Duluth and Minneapolis. Mr. Pillsbury is mistaken. The farmers have every reason for complaint. Mr. Pillsbury asked the farmers to go over the books of the Manitoba company and satisfy themselves as to the grades he was getting. The real trouble begins earlier than that. The uniform grades which the farmers complained of did not appear on the books. It was a fact that at many stations on the road the grade of No. 2 hard was almost unknown, except in name. It was No. 1 hard or No. 1 regular. The intermediate grade was not given the farmer, although there ought to be a difference of three cents a bushel. Mr. Faulkner then detailed the complaints about grades, and showed numerous samples of wheat that he claimed hab been graded too low. He said the farmers did not hope to get redress from the millers' association alone, but from the railroad company's action in the matter as a primary movement. Things are now in such a state on the line of this road that the farmers are getting ready to leave the country. If this is true the decline of the Red River Valley has begun, and this means the decline of the Red River Valley has begun, and this means the decline of the prosperity of the railroad company. When the complaints we have heard so long go to such an extent it becomes something more than an error of judgement. Relief may come in time, under different circumstances, but in the meantime we are starving.

The speaker referred to the policy of the Northwestern road, as explained at the recent meeting in Southern Dakota, and compared that with the system in force on the Manitoba road. When the Northwestern road finds it to an advantage to adopt such a plan, we can only hope that the Manitoba road will adopt a similar course. It is all we ask. We are like drowning men, and are trying to catch hands with the Manitoba road to save us from financial ruin. We want the elevator company to have a fair profit, but we also want a share. We don't want it all.

THE EFFECT ON EMIGRATION.

Anthony Garnett followed Mr. Faulkner. He asserted that the present troubles were doing much to retard emigration to the Red River Valley. He said:

What have we to say to prospective emigrants coming from the East? Up to this time we have always been able to boast of the advantages of the country, but now we think it is our duty to warn people to keep away until the present trouble has been abated. I have had numerous letters from my friends in the East and I have advised them not to "pull up stakes" and come here until they have some assurance that they will receive better treatment than we are getting. I know that not one farmer in ten has made a profit in farming this year. We can't pay our debts and it is only a question of time when we will have to give up the struggle. We ask that the railroad company take sides with us and help us out of our difficulties. We ask that the present elevator system be changed and that we be given an open market for our grain. We don't expect relief all at once, but hope this is a beginning of the solution of our difficulties.

SOME PRACTICAL ILLUSTRATIONS.

James Langton of Pembina county said he had taken a great interest in the development of Dakota, and had induced nearly two hundred good men to go there. He now finds a majority of them very much discontented. Many of them declare they will not break another foot of ground or make any further improvements on their farms until they are assured of a change in the present elevator system. In a good many instances which have come under his personal observation the wheat does not pay the actual cost of raising it.

He declared that the irregular and uncertain system of grading was doing untold injury to the country. He cited his own case. He took two loads of wheat to one station near his farm, and two loads of the same wheat, at the same time, to another station, and the difference in the prices offered was 20 cents a bushel. This state of affairs is beginning to affect business men. A lumber dealer at his station told him that his sales last week were $25, against $750 the corresponding week a year ago. The effect of this is plain, and relief must come in some shape, and come soon.

HOW BUSINESS INTERESTS ARE AFFECTED.

Maj. Hamilton spoke for the business men of the valley. He said:

We come here to ask to be allowed to act as free agents in the disposal of products. We ask, instead of being compelled to filter our wheat through Minneapolis and St. Paul elevators, to be allowed to ship it direct to Eastern markets, unmixed and unadulterated. We do not want to be compelled to pay tribute to those cities in this way. We ask the railroad company to devise some means of relief. We are not here to criticise the management of the company, for we do not know the causes which have brought about the present system, but we do know that the complaints are universal and are becoming too loud to be ignored. If the erection of small warehouses is permitted we can induce Eastern millers to come here and buy our wheat and we will then be assured of the benefits of honest competition. Has not the time come in the development of the Red River Valley when a reduction of the tariff rates can be made without damaging the interests of the road? Business men complain that the present tariff is burdensome, and they are crying for relief. We want to be able to go home and tell our people that this agitation has had a good effect. We want to be reasonable in our requests. We don't want to go too far, but we do want the railroad company to give us some assurance that we will be relieved. Discouraging letters are going East every day, and will do much to retard emigration. Unless some of the evils that exist are abated, we cannot predict continued prosperity for the country. The feeling is one of great despondency, and the results of the present policy will certainly be disastrous to the business interests of our section.

THE RAILROAD SIDE OF THE CASE.

General Manager Manvel then addressed the committee, and spoke for nearly an hour. He went over the whole ground, and viewed the complaints as presented, in detail. He was frank and concise in his statements, but made no definite promises of reform. The substance of his remarks was as follows:

The chairman is correct in his statement that the company desires to cooperate to abolish the abuses which are alleged to exist, and adopt remedies which will be for the good of all concerned. We recognize the fact that unless the farmers along the line of our road are prosperous the business of our company can not be profitable. The fact that you are here to-day as representatives of the farmers of the Red River Valley is good evidence that you are in earnest in your endeavor to understand these matters and settle them in a business way. Three years ago the company found its warehouse capacity was not sufficient to handle the crops, and an order was issued to increase the capacity to a minimum of 20,000 bushels for each elevator on the road. The question of capacity is a matter of judgment, but after careful consideration we thought the present system would be the best. We know something of the experience of older railroad companies in allowing everybody to put up small ware-houses, and we believe that the system is not a good one for the farmer. The matter of responsibility is a very important one, and we have been very careful to protect the farmers along our line from the swindling operations of irresponsible parties. We hav 3,091 box cars and plenty of equipment, if it could all be utilized, to handle the crops along our line, and even more, but 5 per cent of this is always in repair, leaving about 2,790 cars available. We have handled this year about 10,000,000 bushels at about 200 billing stations, an average of one car per day to each station, during the business season. This being the case, the only thing to be done is to give it storage room in elevators during the sixty or ninety days before the storms came on. Of the entire crop fully four-fifths had been marketed before January. I am not an apologist for the elevator companies, but I will say that they having gone in here and put their money into these houses on assurances from us, have a right to expect some protection. Is it fair to allow parties to put up small houses alongside of thes elevators to remain open only during the buying season and then close up when the rush is over, leaving the elevators to keep open during the dull months? It is only fair to the farmers and the railroad that elevators should be kept open all the year, and thus afford a market at all times. In reference to the minimum capacity of 15,000 bushel houses I am not prepared to say now that such buildings will be granted, but the matter will be carefully considered and the committee will be informed later of our decision.

In reply to the question of reducing present tariff rates, Mr. Manvel claimed that the road is now carrying freight as low as it can be done under existing circumstances, and taking into consideration the location of the road. He presented the following facts in support of this statement:

One of the principal roads leading out of Chicago in 1879, carried about the same number of passengers one mile that this company did in 1883 and received a rate of 2.97 cents. The next year they carried 20,000,000 more one mile and then their rate was 2.80 cents Take their freight business. In 1877 their tonnage was about the same as ours in 1883 and their rate per ton [illegible] cents. The [illegible] between our rate and theirs for about equal tonnage was say 25-100 of a cent. Now a quarter cent on our tonnage one mile would be $853,850, so that at the difference in rate, other things being equal, we would have made that amount more than the company named. Now let us see what our advantages and our disadvantages were: The quarter cent per ton per mile would have given us $853,850—and you will observe how large an item so small a reduction makes. Our mileage, to give us the tonnage of 1883, was 5,644,806, but it will be observed from the report that the Chicago company, to get its tonnage, only had to make a mileage of 4,796,929, making us do a mileage of 847,886 additional for the same tons handled. The figures show that it cost them to run their engines that year 18.22 cents, while ours cost 22 65 cents. The difference in their cost and ours would be 8.43 cents, and on their mileage this difference would be $804,-480.35, to which add the 847,886 miles we had to run to gain the same tonnage, and we have $225,961.62; and these two amounts alone, being only one item of extra expense, gives $630,-341.96, making up the full amount, except $223,563 04. Another thing, nothing is charged by us for hauling coal, and none is received except at the extreme southern end of our line. The Chicago road get 60 per cet of their coal without haul, it bein delivered direct from the mine to the locomotive. We charge nothing in engine services for handling coal which last year to unload, put into buckets and place upon the engines cost us 31 cents per ton. If we add this to the above amounts it gives us $53,510.03, and if we charge the actual cost of doing our business on 60 per cent of our coal hauled an average of 200 miles, which is slightly under the average, it gives us 103,567 tons hauled 200 mile, equal to $358,917. To recapitulate, we have in rate an apparent advantage of $853,850. I show—

Difference in expenses for miles run	$404,380 35
Difference in mile	225,961 62
Handling	53,510 03
Freight cost, 60 per cent	258,917 00
Total	$942,769 00

These figures are instructive, as showing how the community you represent are saved, as compared with others, and they show how important a factor the volume of business is in determining what is a fair and reasonable rate. In the figures of coal used account has only been taken of that consumed by locomotives. The amount consumed in shops and car service would be proportionately greater on the lines north.

THE WHEAT QUESTION.

A Pioneer Press correspondent has been along with the Dakota wheat inspectors on a tour of investigation to Southern Dakota, and finds a system prevalent there which would, we think solve our problem in this country. He says:

The investigation of the elevator system on the Winona & St. Peter branch of the Northwestern road, in Southern Dakota, by the grain inspectors, developed some facts that are really refreshing, as compared with the questionable methods in force on the roads in North Dakota. A Pioneer Press correspondent accompanied the inspectors on the trip, and while they were engaged in their work took occasion to do some investigating on his own account. The results show a more hopeful state of affairs for the farmers than has yet been discovered in any other part of the territory since this investigation began. At every station on the Winona & St. Peter road the farmers enjoy the benefits of an open market and square competition. G. W. Van Dusen & Co., operate the only line of elevators on this road, but the market is not closed to independent buyers, and practically no restriction is placed upon the erection of small elevators and flat warehouses. Taking the whole line of the road, there is an average of about four wheat-buyers engaged in business at every station. At some of the larger stations there are as many as five different buyers in the market, and inquiry shows that the competition between them is of the right kind. Farmers are allowed the use of single cars when desired, and many have availed themselves of this privilege the present season to ship their own wheat to Eastern markets. The results in some cases have been satisfactory, and in others the reverse is true. But the simple fact that the farmers in Southern Dakota, along this line of road are placed beyond the control of any one system of elevators, and are free agents in the matter of marketing their grain, practically solves the difficulties that have caused the present agitation among the farmers of the Northwest. There is much complaint among farmers about the low price of wheat, but the causes for this are outside of local influences, and are not chargeable to the elevators or the railroad company. The railroad company virtually controls the buyers on the line in the matter of prices, and they are not allowed to pay a price below the Eastern markets sufficient to rob the farmer of any share of his profits. The station agents on the line are required to furnish the assistant general freight agent every day with a correct statement of the amount of wheat bought, the grade and the price paid. A record of this is kept in the general offices at Winona and comparisons made daily with prices in Eastern markets. If it is found that buyers at any station are paying too low prices, allowing for freight and a margin of about four cents a bushel for elevator charges, the assistant freight agent promptly telegraphs orders to raise the price of wheat at that station, and the buyer is compelled to comply. A clause in the lease of every elevator or warehouse owner provides that the company may annul the contract on thirty days' notice for non-compliance with such orders.

UNJUST GRADING.

Very little hard wheat is raised in Southern Dakota. Farmers as a rule sow the soft varieties, for they claim that they can do better in yield than the difference in prices between the hard and soft varieties will warrant. The greatest amount of wheat received and graded as hard wheat at any one station on the Winona & St. Peter this season is less than 8,000 bushels. Nearly all the wheat is graded as No. 1 and No. 2 regular. At Aurora and Brookings it was found that the small amount of wheat that should have been graded as No. 2 hard was taken as No. 1 and buyers stated that such wheat was not kept separate but was dumped into the same bins with the soft wheat, and sold as such. At Watertown No. 1 hard wheat was found in the elevator of Alexander Bros., which had been taken as No. 1 regular, but the amount was not large. Most of the wheat from this line is sold to the mills at Winona and other points in Southern Minnesota, and is disposed of on its merits as milling wheat and not by grade. A small proportion of the wheat is sold to the millers' association at Minneapolis, but as they are not allowed to fix prices the business of buyers in that direction is limited. The facts developed at the meetings at Brookings and Watertown last week, which were published in the Pioneer Press at the time, represent the actual system of the entire line, as developed by careful investigation. The remarks of the inspectors and railway officials at the latter meeting fully explain the situation, and are important as showing the extent of the power of the inspectors to regulate the evils of the grain trade, and the policy of the Northwestern road.

THE INSPECTORS EXPLAIN.

Maj. Fleming, chairman of the board of inspectors, opened the meeting at Watertown by outlining the purpose for which the board was present. He said:

We desire the fullest investigation of everything connected with the grading, weighing and prices of wheat. To make effective any complaints they must be put in definite shape, and not in general terms. Under the law the inspector cannot proceed unless evidence of actual fraud is produced. When this is done, we will place such evidence in the hands of the district attorney, and he will prosecute the case to the end. This will be done at the expense of the territory, and the desire of the board is to protect to the fullest extent in its power, the farmers of Dakota in the disposition of their crops. At one elevator here we have found to-day a grade of wheat that is strictly No. 2 hard, but which has been taken as No. 1 soft, and it is a wrong and an outrage upon the farmer. The other grades in store here, we think, have been properly graded One of the greatest evils we have found here is the system of dockage. All wheat that has not been cleaned is classed as "dirty wheat" and is docked two pounds to the bushel, or more—never less. I have seen wheat delivered here to-day that was clear, but it was docked the same as dirty wheat. This is another wrong to which the inspectors will attend. Farmers should pay more attention to hard wheat. The low price received for wheat in this section is an argument in favor of the hard and better grades. The difference in price next year will be much greater than this, as the millers' association have expressed the intention of paying ten cents per bushel more for hard wheat than soft.

ASTONISHING LEGISLATIVE WISDOM.

Judge West, one of the board of inspectors, explained the provisions of the law under which the inspectors are working.

He stated that the numerous complaints from Northern Dakota last year gave birth to this wonderful statute The law is copied substantially from the Minnesota statutes, but is less comprehensive in its meaning and impotent in power. It provides that the inspectors shall see that the measure used by elevator men and buyers conforms to the legal half-bushel measure, and that the weights shall be approved by the legal sealer of weights and measures; but there is no such thing as a legal half-bushel provided for in the territorial statutes and no such officer as a sealer of weights exists. The inspectors find themselves so circumscribed by this statute that they are almost powerless. The only thing in the law of any real benefit to anybody is the provision for legal grades. The inspectors had provided a legal standard of grades, which is substantially the same as the grade at Minneapolis, Milwaukee and Chicago. The necessity for this could be readily seen, as it would be useless to make the grade of No. 1 hard 65 pounds in Dakota when such wheat would only grade 58 pounds in those markets. While the authority of the inspectors was very much limited they were determined to do the best they could under the circumstances, and hoped, by meeting and talking with the farmers of the territory, to find out the real cause of complaint, and gather all the information they could with a view of formulating a law which would right the present wrongs They hoped to be able to present the next legislature with information which would enable that body to enact a law which would be effective in its power. He thought the system in operation on the Northwestern road a good one; and, if the company does all it promises, this ought to solve the trouble.

CHARGES AND DENIALS.

Mr. McIntyre said, in order to get the business of the meeting properly presented, and in the absence of any specific charges of fraud, he would present in a general way the charges he had heard made by farmers and others on the streets. It was charged that the Northwestern road was giving special privileges to Van Dusen & Co., and that parties doing business in a small way could not have the same facilities that the larger company did. It was also charged that Van Dusen & Co., got a rebate on all grain shipped by them, which enabled them to come in and crush out all competition. He did not assert that these charges were true, or that they were based on his personal knowledge. He simply gave them as he had heard them.

MR. SANBORN REPLIES.

Mr. Sanborn, assistant superintendent of the Northwestern road, replies as follows:

I have heard the complaints here and elsewhere that Van Dusen & Co., get rebates of one to three cents a bushel. I challenge any man in the county to find where one single shipper on this road has had any different rate from any other than our published tariff. I emphatically deny that G. W. Van Dusen & Co., the Porter Mill company, the Winona Mill company, who are the three principal buyers on our line, now have, or ever had, a rebate on grain shipments from this territory or any different rate from that given to every shipper on the line. When this line was built the country was sparsely settled, and wheat buyers asked the privilege of building flat warehouses. We gave permission to everybody to do so. And we still give such permission. All we ask is that parties building such houses are responsible men. We want to protect our patrons and take care that unreliables are not allowed to buy grain on the line if we know it. There are times when we are compelled to give special rates in order to protect our buyers and keep wheat from going to competing roads; but such special rates are made to everybody and at the same time, and no man is shown any favors over another. We intend to treat everybody well and we intend to protect the farmers along our road. We don't want it said that the farmers in South Dakota on the Winona & St. Peter road are a set of paupers. We recognize the fact that if you are not prosperous the railroad company cannot prosper. We cannot control the grades, but we do control the prices. We compel buyers on our line to pay up to within a reasonable margin of the Eastern markets If prices are found to be too low at any station on our line the buyer there is at once telegraphed to raise the price, and if he refuses, off goes his elevator. If you will appoint a committee to further investigate the charges which have been presented here to-day in a general way, and ascertain all the facts they can, and if the charges are substantiated I will take pleasure in bringing the grain inspector here again to take such evidence, and I will also do all in my power to right any wrongs that may exist.

LET THE ELEVATORS ALONE.

General Freight Agent Mellen said the wheat from this line mostly goes to local mills in Minnesota and Wisconsin and very little goes to Chicago. He said in reply to a question as to the policy of the road:

As far as this company is concerned. I can say to you if the elevators do not use you right, if they do not give you as good grades and prices as you think you ought to have, you need not use them. Let them alone. Cars will be placed at your disposal at as low rates as any other shipper gets, big or little, and you can send your wheat where you please and sell it to whom you please. In this way the farmers can solve this difficulty very promptly. The elevator men may think I am bearing down on them pretty hard, but I want justice done the farmers as well as to them: It is to the interest of the road to have a fair deal on this wheat business, and we will do all we can to bring it about. I have come a thousand miles to see the result of these meetings, and I assure you I am as anxious to have you get all that is due you as you are yourselves. I will say again, what Mr. Sanborn has told you, that no officer of this road is in partnership with any elevator company on the line, and that no favors are shown to any single shipper.

Whereas certain persons observing the feelings of dissatisfaction prevalent throughout our community against our present railway and market facilities, and taking advantage of the universal desire for direct independent railway communication with the Duluth markets, which the oppression of the Minneapolis Millers' Association has produced, considering it a favorable moment to farther their selfish ends, have issued a circular letter (No. 1,) in which they coolly ask you to vote the modest sum of $200,000 for their benefit giving various specious reasons therein by way of excuse for their request. Your careful attention is called to the follwing facts:

1. This road, if built, would not and could not give thedesired relief. The avowed purpose being to build a line from Grand Forks to connect with the Northern Pacific at some point near Brainerd and to do the grading for a branch to connect with the Southwest corner of the county.

This in effect would bethe same as hough the present roa dshould parallel itself, the proposed route being only forty miles nearer to Duluth than the present outlet via Glyndon; and as the Manitoba and Northern Pacific make no secret that both the tariff and earnings are "pooled" from all competing points it will be readily seen, it does not offer even the possibility of relief in the way of markets or rates of transportation.

2. It is well established principle that he who would borrow cash or its equivalent, must himself be financially responsible, or give ample security, but his company have done neither; refusing to lend to their "circular" even the weak support of their individual names, hiding behind the signature of "Respectfully Yours, The Board of Directors."

With commendable frankness they tell you that if they can get the people of Grand Forks to give them money to pay for printing their circulars and to make the canvass needed to secure your affirmative vote on this question, so they can get the bonds put in escrow:

Then, if they can find some one to make them a loan on the strength of the deposit of bonds, they will print some sheets of paper and name them "Stock of the Grand Forks, Crookston & Lake Superior Railway Company," and try to find some one to buy them, with the money so secured one of them will fit up a costly office, have a few teams go to grading and receive 10 per cent. of what money he can spend for superintending the work, while a couple more go on a junketing tour east to secure capital to complete the road.

In plain language, the plan is to make a conditional loan of $200,000 and on this security borrow and beg $1,800,000 more to spend in such way as may suit this mysterious "The Board of Directors."

A plan no doubt, borrowed from the small boy, who, when questioned as to what he was going to do with that egg he had just borrowed and when he would return it, said, "as soon as my pullet begins to lay, but first, I must fit up a nest where my neighbors hens can lay to this egg, after which I will borrow a hen to set on them and raise a breed of my own."

3. You have, and they can give no reliable assurance that the bonds will be returned to the county, and destroyed if the road is not built. In two years from now, when it is assured that the road cannot be built, there is liable to be other hungry adventurers, seeking your vote to divert them to other visionary schemes of public improvement, so called.

4. In voting 6 per cent. interest, bearing bonds to run thirty years for $200,000, you place a $560,000 mortgage on your property, that being the sum you will have to pay before they are redeemed.

5. The Duluth & Winnipeg Railway Company, with a land grant of two million of acres, much of it the best pine in the State, having already expended $300,000 in actual construction of a road which was to have given you the much needed, direct independent outlet to Duluth, is, after years of effort to this end, just succeeding in securing the capital necessary to complete its line, and an affirmative vote on this proposition at this time is to withhold encouragement to that which is of vital importance, to give to that which cannot benefit you.

In conclusion while the pressing need of a competing line of railway and of emancipation from the despotism of the Millers' Association is fully conceded.

While under certain circumstances it might even become your duty to revert to the ever doubtful expediency of bonding your county in favor of a railway; if by so doing you could be assured of a direct independent outlet to the lake, yet to vote the aid asked for by "Respectfully Yours, The Board of Directors," would be to commit a financial blunder from which neither you or your children would ever recover.

Hoping these few words from one who is deeply interested in the prosperity of our fair county will be received in the same spirit of kindness in which they are written, and that your vote will be, "Against the Railroad Proposition."

I am Yours Truly,
E. D. CHILDS.

CONCERTED EXPRESSION AT MOORHEAD.

Moorhead, Special Telegram, Feb. 9.—A farmers' meeting was held in Ericksen's hall this forenoon. Lyman Loring acted as chairman, and L. D. Brown as secretary. A committee on resolutions was appointed, consisting of A. M. Burdick, chairman, Lyman Loring, R. M. Probstfield, F. J. Schrieder and John Erickson; also a committee of organization consisting of O. G. Fardell, A. E. Hall, George King, O. C. Nelson and Sam Partridge. At 2:30 o'clock the committee returned, having drafted the resolutions. Mr. Burdick, before reading them, made a short and pointed speech. He said that the object that brought them together and which was in the minds of the farmers of the Red River Valley was to rouse the farmers to action in asserting and maintaining their rights. They were going to find out whether they lived in a free country, governed by just and equitable laws, or were ruled by oligarchies and monopolies. They would see whether the next legislature was to stand up for the right of freemen or do the bidding of monopolistic corporations, moneyed rings, etc. He then read the resolutions, which make direct and pointed charges against the elevator companies and railroads, and they were unanimously adopted, amid great enthusiasm. In substance they charge the elevator companies with defrauding the farmer, first, in the grading of his wheat; second, in weighing it; third, in the amounts takeng for cleaning it; fourth, in the amounts charged for shrinkage and waste, and five, in the charges for storage and handling. Tehy also state that the roads discriminate in favor of the elevator companies against the farmers. Regular specifications and charges are formulated in systematic arrangement. They recommend that the farmers of every county in the state call county conventions, and elect delegates to a state convention, to meet at St. Paul on the 18th, 19th and 20th of March, the object of which shall be to consult upon the best means of securing united action in the coming election, so as to send men to the legislature that will protect the interests of the citizens. One hundred and twenty-five farmers were present.—[Pioneer Press.

The Real Ruler of Men.

"The pen is the only scepter which is never broken. The only real master is he who controls the thoughts of men. The makers of words is master of the thinker who only uses them. In this domain he has no rival. He stands at the fountain-head of thought, science, civilization. He is controller of all minds—to him all who talk, think, write or print, pay ceaseless and involuntary tribute. In this sense, Noah Webster is the all-shaping, all-controlling mind of this hemisphere. He grew up with his country, and largely by his Spelling Book and Dictionaries, he molded the intellectual character of her people. Not a man has sprung from her soil, on whom he has not laid his all-forming hand. His principles of language have tinged every sentence that is new, or ever will be uttered by an American tongue. His genius has presided over the language of the whole nation. It is universal, omnipotent, omnipresent. No man can breathe the air of the continent and escape it. The scepter which the great lexicographer wields so unquestionably, was most worthily won. It was not inherited, it was achieved. It cost a life-struggle for an honest, brave, unfaltering heart—a clear, serene intelect. No propitious accident favored his progress. The victory was won after a steady trial of sixty years."

St. Paul Globe: The committee of farmers from the Red River Valley stated their grievances to Mr. Manvel, of the Manitoba road, yesterday, and will continue their interview to-day. It does not appear that anything very practical was accomplished yesterday, but some good is likely to grow out of the agitation. It is certain that the farmers have great cause of complaint, owing to unfair grading of wheat, and it is as important to the railroads as to the settlers, that there should be a remedy.

Polk County Journal.

OFFICIAL PAPER OF THE COUNTY.

CROOKSTON, THURSDAY, FEB. 14.

THE BONDS.

The question of bonding this county in aid of a railroad to the head of Lake Superior comes before the people of the county on Tuesday next, and the JOURNAL considers it one of so great importance that it devotes much space to its discussion, pro and con, so that its readers may have an opportunity, upon weighing well all the arguments advanced, of casting their votes intelligently. Bonding a county in aid of a railroad is always a serious matter, and it should never be done only in extreme cases—only in cases wherein the benefits to be derived are largely in excess of the cost, and then only after the most positive assurance of good faith have been given that the peoples' money shall not be squandered. Monopolists have plundered our people at will—public expenses have increased and multiplied until Polk County has a goodly amount of taxes to pay, and if this proposition is but a scheme to gobble up more money and pile up the public debt still higher with no value received, then it should be rejected. We well remember when the elevator system was adopted in this country and well we know the fact that every year the system has become more and more exacting until the past fall our wheat has been taken from us by absolute force at less than the cost of producing, and that, too, when on the markets of the world we could have had a fair living profit. We are positive, that if the facts could be known and the actual figures ascertained that those figures would show over $200,000 taken out of the pockets of the farmers of Polk County this fall, money that they have earned by the sweat of their brows and to which they were justly entitled. In fact so grievous has become the burden that many have left the country for no other reason, many have been sold out by the Sheriff and many would sell out and go now if they could get barely the cost of their implements. Among the plans devised for relief has been the plan to build a railroad to Lake Superior. This measure has grown out of the wheat agitation, and farmers and business men have recognized the fact that a direct, independent line of road to Duluth, having an independent line of elevators, would give us at least ten cents per bushel more for our wheat than we now get, as the freight rate would be less and it would create competition in wheat buying, and furthermore, it would provide a method by which we could get our No. 1 Hard wheat into eastern markets without being mixed with soft wheat and wheat of inferior grades, as it is to day. This road would also bring freight into the country at cheaper rates, because it connects direct with water navigation. It would also furnish pine lumber at a great reduction from present rates, because it goes through a magnificent body of pine that to be utilized must be reached by a railroad. It is useless to discuss its many benefits, because they have been so often discussed that all are perfectly familiar with them, and farmers and business men, when they have felt the pinching of the millers' extortion, have resolved that they would do anything in reason if they could get an independent road to Duluth. This road, the Grand Forks, Crookston and Lake Superior R. R. Co. now offer you for a simple bonus of a few dollars per year to each tax payer, and will you now act consistent with your former professions and vote it? The millers will take as much out of your pockets every year as is asked by the G. F., C. & L. S. R. R. Co. Just as long as they can retain the power to do so, and they will retain that power until an independent line of road takes it from them. The opponents of the road tell you that if you vote the bonds you will get no road and will have to pay the bonds all the same. The statutes of Minnesota and the railroad company say that can't be done, that if you get no road, you pay no bonds, which is true. The company is composed of men among you who have personally felt the wrongs that you have and who are just as much interested in the endeavor to correct them as you are, and while they do not profess to have the money to build the line, they do profess to know where they are going to obtain it. A telegram from Washington last week informed our citizens that T. B. Walker was in Washington fighting against Nelson's Red Lake Reservation bill, a bill got up especially in the interest of the poor settlers of this country, and this week we publish a letter from Mr. Walker opposing this line of road. He takes the narrow view that Crookston will be injured materially by the road, but forgets to say that the whole county outside will be greatly benefitted by having pine lumber cheaper. Mr. Walker will have pine lumber to sell in this country, but he don't want it to come faster than he can make and sell it, therefore he opposes Nelson's bill and the new road because he knows they will afford cheap lumber for this country. Self interest is at the bottom of his action in these matters, and so it will be found to be the motive of nearly all who oppose the new road. If you examine you will find that they have an axe to grind somewhere. They all (except T. B. Walker) admit that a road to Duluth would do all you hope for it, but because it cannot run through every man's garden, they oppose it. They admit that it is just as beneficial to the north, south, east and west portions of this county as it would rule the wheat market and force competition, and yet after all that, for simply local causes—PURE SELFISHNESS—they oppose it and advise and urge others to do so They know that this is a very serious question and we have given it very serious attention, and our advice to our farmer friends and all others is to consider the question very carefully before deciding to vote against the bonds. You now have a chance offered you to cast off the shackles that bind you and oblige you to sacrifice your labor every year to build up the millers' monopoly. You know that they are opposed to any line of road that will break their monopoly, and you know that could they vote on the question they would vote a great big

NO.

Now, if you want to help them you can vote here and you can vote just as they would. You can vote no bonds and please the millers who have this year taken over $200,000 out of the pockets of Polk County farmers wrongfully. The millers' agents will tell you that this is a scheme on the part of sharpers to get the bonds for their own aggrandizement. You know that such men as Louis Berthiaume, Ed. Walsh, Paul C. Sletten, J. R. Clements, Wm. Box, Judge Reynolds and all the rest, are among the most prominent farmers and business men in our county, having large interests at stake; you know that they are men who have studied this wheat question earnestly and have tried to devise ways and means out of the difficulty, and have settled upon this as the only sure way out, and their large interests in this county is sufficient guarantee that they are acting candidly and honestly in this matter, and that they would not (even if they could) descend to "put up a job on the tax payers." The very idea is absurd and only shows to what desperate straits the opposition are driven when they will descend to such palpable lies. These gentlemen assure you that if you vote the bonds the road will be built. They are as much interested as any one, and no more, and if they were not confident of their ability to perform their promises they would not engage in what to them must prove a losing business if they should fail. They say they can furnish an independent outlet and they know whereof they affirm. The opposition and everybody agrees that with an independent outlet a bonus of $200,000 is cheap and is well expended. You have now an opportunity to secure this independent outlet and your vote next Tuesday will show whether you deserve to be freemen and have a right to get what your wheat is worth or not. Think it over very carefully for you cannot afford to make a mistake.

The Minneapolis millers are mostly loaded up with wheat at low prices, and we predict they will make big money this year.—Minneapolis Evening Journal. That's it exactly, the Minneapolis millers have a chronic habit of "loading up with wheat at low prices" and making "big money" at the expense of the farmer whenever they can get a grip upon him and force him to submit to the prices they dictate. That is what the Northwest is protesting against. Duluth Tribune.

ELECTION NOTICE.

NOTICE is hereby given that an election will be held by the legal voters of Polk County, Minnesota, at the usual place of holding elections in the several voting precincts of said county, on Tuesday, the 19th day of February, 1884, to vote on a proposition made by the Grand Forks. Crookston & Lake Superior Railroad company to said county for aid in the construction of a line of railroad through said county. The substance of the proposition to be voted on is that said Polk County shall issue its bonds for two hundred thousand dollars to run thirty years, but payable at the option of the county after twenty years from their date and drawing six per cent interest payable semi-annually, and both principal and interest payable at the Merchants National Exchange Bank in New York, and that said bonds shall be deposited in said bank in trust for said company, to be delivered when it shall have been completed ready for the running of cars upon its main line of railroad from the east bank of the Red River opposite the city of Grand Forks, in Dakota, through said county to the city of Crookston, to the head of Lake Superior, or to a point of connection with some other railroad constructed and in operation to the head of said lake, and also graded ready for the superstructure of a branch of said line from Crookston or some point west thereof to the east bank of the Red River at or near the South-west corner of said county. Provided said main line shall be so constructed and said branch so graded within three years from the date of such proposition; and provided further, that no interest shall be payable upon said bonds, the coupons for which shall have matured prior to such delivery.

The said county at its option to receive from said company an amount of shares of its capital stock equal at its par value to the amount of said bonds to be deposited at the same time with the same bank and to be delivered when said bonds are delivered. The voting upon such proposition will be by ballot, upon which shall be written or printed the words, "For the railroad proposition," or the words "Against the railroad proposition."

Such election to be conducted and the vote canvassed and returned as in case of a general election.

Dated this [illegible] day of February, [illegible]

P. J. McGUIRE, County Auditor.

The Northern Water Route.

Minneapolis Evening Journal.

The Journal wishes to be placed on record as heartily in favor of the Hudson's Bay water route. The scheme may appear chimerical to those who give it only a cursory glance; but the fact mains that the people most interested in it, who live in the region to be benefitted by it, and who must put up their money for it in some way if it is undertaken, are convinced of its entire feasibility. The only strenuous objection urged anywhere is that of climate. It is claimed that the outlet via Hudson's Bay can never be open and free from ice more than six months in the year, and in some seasons not more than three. A six months' season would generally be ample to send the surplus of the northern wheat belt to market through that route. But suppose the wheat surplus of any one year could not find an outlet the same fall by that route. Is not the great bulk of the wheat crop of each year stored in elevators in the west through the winter and sent to market in the spring? Look at the immense elevator capacity of Chicago and Milwaukee, to say nothing of Minneapolis and a thousand smaller points, crammed full during the close of lake and canal navigation, and moving to market when the opening of the ice-locked water ways puts down freights so that it can be profitably shipped. If the Hudson's Bay route were opened there would be plenty of capital forthcoming to supply elevator capacity at Fargo, Grand Forks, Winnipeg, and on the shores of Hudson's Bay to carry the wheat crop over to another season. Of course the water-way, if once opened, would be supplemented by railroads. There is now a live project for a railroad from Winnipeg to Hudson's Bay. But the water-way is also needed to act, like the great Lakes and Erie canal farther south, as a check upon railroad extortion.

One important fact must be remembered in considering this water way with its outlet pointing to the north instead of the south. The climate of this whole northwestern region is undoubtedly to be greatly modified by settlement and cultivation. Old residents of Minnesota are distinctly conscious of a gradual lessening in the severity of the winters here with the construction of railroads, the influx of population, and the up-turning of the soil by cultivation. We look forward to the time, when the vast fertile region north of us shall be thickly dotted with farms and villages, when our winters here at Minneapolis will be as mild on the average as those of central Illinois. The modification will of course extend to a greater or less degree, all though the northwest region. The period of navigation on Hudson's Bay greatly varies. Even now it sometimes extends through as much as seven months of the year, and it is a fair presumption that science will yet discover some means of lengthening the average period during which the outlet into the Atlantic ocean will be open to vessels.

It is perhaps not inappropriate at this time to remind some of our brethren of the press in northern Minnesota and Dakota, who are growing enthusiastic for the Hudson's Bay route, that not long ago they were ready to treat with ridicule The Journal's suggestion of a water route from Minneapolis via the Minnesota and Red Rivers to Winnipeg. If the northern portion of this water route is feasible the southern portion surely is. If the Hudson Bay scheme is carried to success, we can guarantee our northern neighbors that Minneapolis will chip in and, by establishing slack-water navigation from here to some navigable point on the Red River, make Minneapolis the southern terminus of the great northern water route to Europe.

Hands Cut Off.

Perham Bulletin: Last Saturday Drs. Norton, of Detroit and Aubin and Richardson were called upon to amputate both forearms of a man by the name of Johnson. Three or four weeks ago this man Johnson was returning to his home north of Pine Lake, driving a yoke of cattle, and was filled to overflowing with "elegant booze" and while crossing the lake fell from the [illegible] he lay in this drunken state till morning, when he was found and taken home. He did not wish a physician, so lay there with his frozen limbs, suffering a dozen deaths until the doctors were called on Saturday and found that amputation of both hands were necessary. It is a terrible affair, yet a warning to all.

The Northern Outlet.

Fargo Republican.

The proposition to secure a northern outlet, via Lake Winnipeg and Hudson's Bay to the ocean is one of paramount importance to the farmers of all North Dakota, and in fact, the entire Northwest. The question is not a new one; its feasibility was canvassed years ago, and it was found that a comparatively short stretch of rapids in Nelson River was the only one great obstacle standing in the way of navigation from Fargo to Hudson's Bay. Settlement at that time was not sufficiently large to give a great deal of impetus to the scheme, and by common consent the the plan rested until the demands of settlement, and the wrongs perpetrated by the present system of transportation, naturally led to its revival, and now the entire wheat producing section has turned to it with the fond hope that it will deliver them from the power of the monopolies now oppressing them. We regard the possibilities of this route in the light of other human achievements in the way of ship canals and improved highways of commerce, we are impressed with the idea that there are no obstacles in the path northward, that money and engineering skill cannot remove: Greater obstacles than those existing in Nelson River have been rolled aside by the same agencies and there is no good reason why we should not expect to see these difficulties surmounted, and our grain going north to supply European demand. Our No. 1 hard wheat already has a prestige among English millers and there is a strong probability that they would hail such facilities as this route would afford them for getting at it direct, with great delight. The class journals of English elevators in the northwest, complaining that under present processes, the wheat they buy has to pass through the hands of too many speculators on its way to the Atlantic, and that an English demand is always anticipated by sudden jumps in prices in America, that has a correspondingly depressing effect on the other side of the water; every time they want our wheat, the speculators and gamblers run the prices up to take advantage of the demand. They know this, and would rather buy almost anywhere else than in a market where their every movement is anticipated by increased prices.

This route would bring the foreign miller into direct communication with the producers of the commodity he wants; it would carry him by the strong-holds of the gamblers and place him on an equal footing, in the market, with the speculators who have hitherto held the advantage of him. The route is a natural one to transport hard wheat over, because no climatic extremes injurious to the grain has to be encountered. It is true that our river is closed in the winter, but Hudson Bay is open, and upon its shores there is room to erect elevators holding millions of bushels of wheat that could be deposited in them during the open months. There are difficulties in the way of course, but they are vincible, and the interests involved in opening this great artery of trade is sufficient, when once crystalized and brought to bear with all the force of unanimity, to push the work to successful completion.

In view of the great importance of this question the Republican suggests the propriety of organizing clubs throughout Northern Dakota and Minnesota to discuss the proposition and take such steps as may be considered wise, looking to the agitation of the matter, and securing an appropriation of congress for the improvement of the Red River, and lending such assistance as may be appropriate to the citizens of Winnipeg and Manitoba, in securing the improvement of Nelson River, and would be pleased to hear from representative citizens relative to such a movement.

If this artery of commerce could be successfully opened, it would advance the material interests of Dakota, and in fact the entire northwest, more than all other instrumentalities combined.

Stoughton, (Wis) Hub: The farmers of Minnesota are in that state of nervous irritability best described as hopping mad. They adopted the biennial system a short time ago and now when they want a session of the legislature they can not have it. They discovered that the way to bring about a millenium in state government was not to have a legislature convene oftener than once in two years. So they voted for biennial sessions with a unanimity that fell into the ballot box with a thud. But after they had so voted and got the biennial system adopted they found that they had been deceived, deluded and taken in. During the years past, while they had been voting and running campaigns on issues pertaining to the south, the negroes, etc., the railroad companies had been framing the legislation of Minnesota to suit the railroads. Then the farmers found that the railroads and elevator companies had the grain-growers of the state completely in their clutches. A petition signed by almost the solid farmer vote of the state implores the governor to convene an extra session [illegible] governor refuses. The farmers must submit to extortion another year. Then, in the hullaballoo of a presidential election, anything so in significant as the rights of the farmers of Minnesota will be forgotten and ignored.

WHEREAS, DEFAULT HAS BEEN MADE in the conditions of a certain mortgage executed and delivered by Henry S. Begemen and Amelia S. Begemen his wife as mortgagors, to Henry Hammel mortgagee, dated the 21st day of March A. D. eighteen hundred and eighty-two and recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds of the County of Polk, in the State of Minnesota, on the seventh day of April A. D. 1882, a nine o'clock and forty-five minutes a. m., in book "G" of mortgages, on pages 253, 254 and 255, on which there is claimed to be due, at the date of this notice, the amount of sixty-seven dollars and fifty cents with interest thereon at the rate of ten per cent. per annum from the twenty first day of March A. D. 1882, and no action or proceedings has been instituted at law or in equity to recover the debt secured by said mortgage or any part thereof.

Now, notice is hereby given, that by virtue of a power of sale contained in said mortgage, and of the statute in such case made and provided, said mortgage will be foreclosed by sale of the mortgaged premises therein described, at public auction at the front door of the court house, in the city of Crookston, in the County of Polk, and State of Minnesota, on Saturday the eighth (8th) day of March A. MORTGAGE SALE.

DEFAULT HAVING BEEN MADE IN THE payment of the sum of five hundred and twenty-eight and forty-nine one hundredths dollars, ($528 49-100,) which is claimed to be due at the date of this notice upon a certain mortgage duly executed and delivered by Carrie Dewey and Alvah Dewey her husband to H. D. Childs bearing date the 14th day of June A. D. 1883 and, with a power of sale therein contained, duly recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds in and for the County of Polk, and State of Minnesota, on the 19th day of June A. D. 1883, at 2 o'clock p. m., in book "N" of mortgages, on page 60, to secure the payment of a certain promissory note for the sum of five hundred dollars payable September 14th, 1883, with interest at the rate of ten per cent. per annum until paid, and duly executed and delivered by said Carrie Dewey and Alvah Dewey her husband, and no action or proceeding having been instituted, at law or otherwise, to recover the debt secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof, or the interest thereof.

Now therefore, notice is hereby given, that by virtue of the power of sale contained in said mortgage, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the premises described in and conveyed by said mortgage, viz: Lots eight and nine (8 and 9) in block five (5) and the east half of lot twenty-two (22) in block two (2) (all situate in the village of Fisher) according to the original plat thereof on file in the office of the Register of Deeds, in and for said Polk County, and State of Minnesota, with the hereditaments and appurtenances; which sale will be made by the sheriff of said Polk County, at the front door of the Court House, in the city of Crookston, in said County, and State, on the 29th day of March A. D. 1884, at ten o'clock a. m., of that day, at public vendue, to the highest bidder for cash, to pay said debt and interest, and the taxes, if any, on said premises, and twenty-five dollars attorney's fees as stipulated in and by said mortgage in case of foreclosure, and the disbursements allowed by law; subject to redemption at any time within one year from the day of sale, as provided by law.

DEFAULT HAVING BEEN MADE IN THE payment of the sum of two hundred and thirty seven dollars, ($237.00,) which is claimed to be due at the date of this notice upon a certain mortgage, duly executed and delivered by Gideon Derosier a single man, to Charles H. Minor, of Racine, Wisconsin, bearing date the 30th day of March, A. D. 1882, and, with a power of sale therein contained, duly recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds in and for the County of Polk and State of Minnesota, on the 30th day of March A. D. 1882, at 4 o'clock p. m. in book "F" of mortgages, on pages 298 and 299, in the sum of two hundred dollars, to secure the payment of one certain promissory note for said sum of two hundred dollars, payable on the 30th day of March 1885, with interest thereon at the rate of ten per cent. per annum payable on the first day of January of each year until paid, and containing a clause that if default be made in the payment of any interest, or any portion thereof for the space of ten days after the same becomes payable, then all said principal and interest, shall at the option of the holder thereof become immediately due and payable, without further notice, and whereas two installments of interest amounting to thirty-seven dollars has been due and payable for more than ten days, and no action or proceeding having been instituted, at law or otherwise, to recover the debt secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof or said installments of interest.

Now therefore, notice is hereby given, that by virtue of the power of sale contained in said mortgage, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the premises described in and conveyed by said mortgage, viz: The northeast quarter (ne¼) of Section No. twenty-two (22,) in Township No. one hundred and fifty-one (151,) north, of Range No. forty-six (46) west, of the 5 P. M., containing one hundred and sixty acres more or less, according to the United States Government survey thereof and situated in Polk County and State of Minnesota, with the hereditaments and appurtenances; which sale will be made by the Sheriff of said Polk County, at the front door of the Court House in the City of Crookston, in the said County and State, on the 6th day of March A. D. 1884, at ten o'clock a. m., of that day, at public vendue, to the highest bidder for cash, to pay said debt and interest, and the taxes, if any, on said premises, and twenty-five dollars attorney's fees as stipulated in and by said mortgage in case of foreclosure, and the disbursements allowed by law; subject to redemption at any time within one year from the day of sale, as provided by law.

(First insertion Jan. 10th, 1884.)

Notice of Mortgage Foreclosure Sale.

DEFAULT HAS OCCURRED IN THE CONditions of a certain mortgage made, executed and delivered by Knud Knudsen and Kate D. Knudsen, his wife, mortgagors, to Elwood S. Correr, mortgagee, which said mortgage bears date the fourteenth day of April, A. D. 1882, and was recorded on the seventeenth day of April A. D. 1882, in the office of the Register of Deeds of Polk County, in the State of Minnesota, in book "I" of mortgages on page 31. No action has been instituted at law to recover the amount secured by said mortgage.

There is claimed to be due thereon and is actually due on said mortgage at the date of this notice, the sum of five hundred dollars ($500) with interest from the fifteenth day of February, A. D. 1883, at the rate of ten (10) per cent. per annum.

The premises set forth in and conveyed by said mortgage are situated in the County of Polk in the State of Minnesota, and are as follows, to-wit: Lot seven (7) in block fourteen (14) in the village of Carman, according to the recorded plat thereof.

The said mortgage contains a full power of sale in due form of law, in case of default of payment of the said principal or interest in said mortgage specified, or any part thereof, when due. Said mortgage also contains a stipulation on the part of the said mortgagor to pay the sum of ten dollars ($10) as and for attorney's fees for the foreclosure thereof.

Whereas, default has been made in the payment of the principal sum and interest due on said mortgage, and said power of sale has become operative.

Now, therefore, notice is hereby given that by reason of said default and by virtue of the power of sale in said mortgage contained, and pursuant to the statutes in such case made and provided, the said above described mortgaged premises will be sold at public auction at the front door of the Court House, in the city of Crookston, in the County of Polk and State of Minnesota, on Saturday, the first day of March, A. D. 1884, at ten o'clock a. m. to satisfy the amount then due on said mortgage, together also with ten dollars ($10) stipulated by said mortgagors to be paid as attorney fees, and including also such costs as are allowed by law.

Dated this seventh day of January, 1884.

'ROUND HOME.

Mr. Beecher has returned from his eastern trip.

Henry Lewis returned from St. Paul last night. He intends to remain awhile.

Rev. C. E Page went to Fergus Falls to preach last Sabbath and a Fergus clergyman filled his pulpit in this city.

Very little wheat is coming in at present. The price still hangs fire in the same old notch, 79 cents for No 1 Hard.

The Hon. James Hill, of Warren, Wis., was in the city this week. Mr. Hill has large interests in the Red River Valley. He is a member of the firm of E. D. Childs & Co.

Mr. W. H. Fisher, formerly Superintendent of this road, come up last Thursday evening returning on Friday morning. He is now interested in the Duluth and Winnipeg R. R.

Mr. E. H. Shaw, a Crookston old-timer, has been doing hard work for past week against the issue of the bonds, which seems to imply that E. H. thinks Polk Co., don't know what she wants.

Messrs. Bucknam & Guse have opened a roller skating rink in Dobson's new brick block, on Second street and appear to be doing a lively business on wheels. The boys have struck a popular lead which bids fair to become a bonanza.

The Hon. Halvor Steenerson looms up several feet taller to-day. A ten pound urchin arrived at his residence last night. Mother and child doing well and Halvor thinks, with great care, he will also pull through.

Scarlet fever is prevalent in the city. Among the sufferers is Miss Grace Page, oldest daughter of Rev. C. E Page. Great care should be exercised to prevent the spreading of this disease, "an ounce of prevention being better than a pound of cure."

The contract for the new addition to the brewery, which the JOURNAL some time ago announced would be built next spring, has been awarded Jos. Netzer. Mr. Chas Jefferson will do the brick work. The work will be commenced as early in the season as feasible.

The Lake Park Local, a bright little seven colom folio, published at Lake Park, Becker Co., Minn., is on our table. If the first issue is a criterion to judge by, Lake Park will have an excellent local paper, and a cheap one as we notice that H. W. announces his price to be 50 cents per annum. He must have dropped out the essential $1, however.

The committee of ten, appointed by the Grand Forks convention to interview the railroad company, have made their report in full and it was ordered published in pamphlet form for general circulation. The Grand Forks Herald publishes it in full and next week we shall lay it before our readers so that they may be enabled to draw their own conclusions as to the amount of relief to be expected.

Monday was a very warm day but threatening a storm until about dusk when one of those blizzards what you read about set in and just got right up on its hind legs and howled for keeps. We have heard of no disastrous results except in the case of Fred Fox who, we are told, froze his fingers very badly while going home. Jim. Westover started for home but got in a snow-drift and wisely concluded to come back to the city and stay all night.

Mr. Harry Attix, of Mentor, on Maple Lake, made us a pleasant call on Friday last. Harry has been practicing what we have been preaching all along—diversified farming—and has fine herds of stock growing up about him. He says his experience justifys our theory that there is far more money in stock than in wheat and he says the sooner farmers come to their milk (as it were) the sooner will they strike the true trail for independence. He has a lot of hogs, a fine herd of grade Jerseys and is living like a lord out on the shores of the beautiful lake while many are sinking money trying to raise wheat. Harry gave us a bit of news, also that will surprise the many friends of George Bunzy Esq.—not very much. He says that on January 1st George was quietly and effectually tied for life to a beautiful young lady who recently arrived from the East to grow up with this country and that George is now enjoying the honey moon upon his claim near the lake. The JOURNAL can say for George that he is a splendid good fellow well calculated to make some good woman a husband and we wish him much joy in his new venture hoping that he will find that "diversified husbandry" pays better in the long run than all wheat.

The Art Loan Exhibition closed last Saturday evening with a grand concert and is pronounced to be a great success, creditable alike to all who contributed to make it so. Among the exhibits were some beautiful agates brought from the old country by Phil Porger.

The Bonds.

At this writing we have not received the full returns from the election but enough have been received to show that the bonds are defeated beyond a doubt. We do not propose to question the verdict for we believe that it was arrived at mainly from an honest, though mistaken, impression that the company would not have been able to secure the building of the road had the bonds been voted. We believe that to be a mistaken idea and that the people will see it in time. The conservative spirit manifested in the matter of bonding is all right as a general rule but even that may be carried too far as in this case. We do not, however, read in their verdict that Polk Co, is opposed to giving $200,000 to aid in building an outlet to the lake but we do read that she insists that when she does vote aid the guarantee must be absolutely sure without a question of doubt that she will get what she pays for. If any aid is to be given to such a project those asking it must throw such safeguards around it as will leave no chance for a shadow of doubt in the matter. It is regarded a question of too much importance to the county to leave a chance for evasion and this is as it should be, for carelessness, or negligence in public affairs is reprehensible above all things. Should this proposition ever come up again it must be so carefully worded that the county could not by any chance become the loser or be involved in expensive litigation to defend its rights. While this would not have happened had these bonds been voted it seems that a majority of the voters in the county thought differently and it is defeated but not cast down.

Pinafore.

The Ada Pinafore company presented that ever popular opera at Ericsson's Hall on Monday and Tuesday evening, to crowded houses. We had heard that they were well up in their parts but must confess to a very pleasing surprise, as we had not quite expected to see a home company come so near perfection as this company does. We went prepared to make all necessary apologies for any shortcoming that might crop out and we are now obliged to apologize to the company for our lack of faith for we found them well qualified to appear before any audience in the land. The fact that they filled the hall both nights speaks more for their excellent rendering each of his or her several parts than could we in a column. Geo. Ashelman did Sir Joseph Porter K. C. B., in right royal style. He wore a stunning scarlet jacket, and very tight pants, "and so did his"—part with royal elegance; ably assisted by his "sisters and his cousins and his aunts." Fred Kayle did Capt. Corcoran up in good style eliciting hearty admiration as well as did his lovely daughter Josephine, Mrs. D. H. Fisk who took her part with grace and ease. Ben F. Ashelman, as Ralph Rackstraw, did the part of the able seaman to perfection, while D. C. Lighthoun's, Dick Deadeye left little to be wished for in that worthy. But we must not forget Buttercup—dear little Buttercup though we can never tell why—because we are a grave old Benedict and it would ill become us to risk the peace of our camp by expressing our opinion of Miss Annie Castle's "Little Buttercup." Suffice it to say that that young lady seemed to grasp the situation perfectly and to fit into its parts as naturally as though 'twere but an every day occurrence. G. H. Morse W. A. Cragin, Ed Ashelman and the midshipmite came in for their share of the applause as well they deserved to by rendering their parts well. Mrs Geo. Ashelman, as Hebe ably supported mi lud, Sir Joseph, and so did his sisters and his cousins and his aunts and helped in no small degree to round out the perfect whole. The closing chorus, "He is an Englishman was rendered with fine effect in a manner which did great credit to the whole crew and their excellent director Mr. J. W. Blanchard.

PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS.

Monday, February 11.

SENATE.—Soon after the senate met this morning, Pendleton of Ohio arose to perform the saddest and one of the most heroic acts of his life, and that was to present the credentials of his successor, Henry B. Payne, recently elected to Mr. Pendleton's seat by the Ohio legislature. He did it without flinching.

Bills were introduced for a survey of passes between the affluents of the upper Mississippi and Columbia rivers to ascertain the distance between the navigable waters of those rivers; authorizing a foot and carriage or railroad bridge across the river at St. Paul (Mr. McMillan); authorizing the Mississippi river commission to appropriate land and material repuired for its work. The bill passed securing to American inventors the full term of seventeen years for their patents in cases where foreign patents expire before that time. The senate voted to recede from its amendment to the Greely relief expedition bill. The resolution for the relief of flood sufferers, mentioned in the house proceedings, was adopted.

The bill reported in the senate fixing the salaries of judges of district courts fixed the salaries of judges of the districts of Minnesota, Kansas and Western Arkansas from July 1, 1884, at $4,000 and the judges of the following districts.

The Senate confirmed; Henry D. Lyman, Ohio, second assistant postmaster general; William Christy Wilson, La., assayer of the mint, New Orleans; Thomas B. Knapp, postmaster, Iowa Falls, Iowa.

Register of Land Offices—Myron H. McCord, Wausau, Wis.; Henry Esperson, La Crosse, Wis.; R. N. Johnson, Fergus Falls, Minn.; Henry W. Lord, Creelsburg, Dak.

Carrie G. Bell, receiver of public moneys, Bayfield, Wis.

Nominations.—Henry M. Lawson, Texas, agent Quapaw agency, Indian Territory; Daniel B. Dyer, Kan., agent Cheyenne band, Arapahoe agency, Indian Territory. James H. Stewart, postmaster, Charleton, Iowa.

HOUSE.—Bills and resolutions were introduced facilitating the settlement of private land claims; restoring those dropped from the pension rolls for disloyalty; providing for the election of president and abolishing the electoral college; encouraging Indian education in Dakota; abolishing the office of assistant surgeon general of the army; for the construction of bridges across the Mississippi at St. Paul (Mr. Washburn); repealing the import duty on books in foreign languages (Milo White); for the preservation of forests at the sources of navigable rivers; amending the Pacific railroad act so as to require a company to build a railroad and telegraph line from Sioux City, Iowa, west to the Union Pacific via the Niobrara valley (Milo White); requiring the secretary of the treasury to pay $100,000 000 in 3 per cent. bonds. The military academy appropriation bill was reported, also a joint resolution appropriating $300,000 for the relief of the flood sufferers. After a long debate the resolution passed—233 to 12.

Mr. Washburn introduced in the house today a bill to authorize the construction of one or more carriage or railroad bridges across the Mississippi river at St. Paul. It is a substitute for a similar bill introduced by him some tim ago.

A bill was introduced in the house to-day by Hon. D. B. Henderson of Iowa to provide for the issue of circulating notes to national bank associations.

Tuesday, February 12.

SENATE.—Bills to suspend the coinage of silver dollars till Jan. 1, 1886, and prohibiting political assessments, were introduced. The bill for the construction of a building for the congressional library passed.

The senate passed a bill directing the secretary of the treasury to pay Mrs. Louisa Boddy of Oregon $5,400 in full settlement of her claim against the United States for depredations committed and property taken and destroyed by the Modoc Indians in November, 1879.

A bill was introduced by Mr. McPherson to suspend the coinage of standard silver dollars. It provides that the coinage be suspended until Jan. 1, 1886, and that trade dollars be recieved in sums of $5 or less for postage and revenue stamps, and converted into bullion.

Mr. Voorhees introduced a bill to prohibit assessments for political purposes, of government officials and employes. He said he was prepared to show that assessments were now being made on employes of the government for political purposes. The bill punishes the giver as well as the man who makes the demand. Mr. Voorhees asked that the bill be referred to the judiciary committee.

The President sent the Senate the following nominations:

Wilber F. Goodspeed, Ohio, United States marshal, northern district of Ohio. Charles L. Holstem, Indiana, United States attorney, district of Indiana.

Confirmations—John W. Langston, minister resident and consul general to Havti, also charge d'affaires at Santo Domingo; Henry F. Wild, consul, Conception Delofa, Ecx.; John R. McFee, Ill., register of the land office, Las Cruces, N. Mex. Postmaster—Edward S. Tobey, Boston, Mass.; James Stewart, Chariton, Iowa.

HOUSE.—Mr. Potter introduced a bill to extend the bonded debt of the United States at 2 1-2 per cent. The bills to retire trade dollars and provide for the construction of the Hennepin canal were reported. The naval appropriation bill was debated, and Mr. Calkins ridiculed our so-called navy unsparingly.

Wednesday, February 13.

SENATE.—A resolution is directed to the secretary of the interior to withhold for the present his approval for the patents or certificates for lands seelected by the Northern Pacific Railroad company in lieu of others said to have been lost to the company under the act of 1864. The McPherson bill for the issue of circulating notes to national banking associations was considered. Messrs Bayard and McPherson spoke in favor of the bill, and Mr. Sherman made a speech on the silver question. It is probable the discussion will continue for several days, but the opinion of those best informed is that the McPherson bill will be finally adopted with a few verbal amendments extending in terms its provisions to banks already in operation.

HOUSE—The Chalmers-Manning contested case (Mississippi) was debated without result. Nothing praise worthy was done.

Thursday, February 14.

SENATE.—Senator Logan introduced a bill to provide that persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service of the United States shall be preferred for appointment to civil offices, provided they possess the necessary business qualifications.

Senator Beck introduced a bill to provide for the organization of supreme courts in the territories.

The bill declaring all public roads and highways post routes passed. The McPherson bank bill was debated, and Mr. Morrill offered a substitute.

HOUSE.—Nothing worthy of note was done beyond the discussion of the Manning-Chalmers contest.

Friday, February 15.

SENATE.—At 1 o'clock a message was received from the house announcing that that body had passed a joint resolution making a further appropriation of $200,000 for the relief of destitution by the overflow of the Ohio river and tributaries. It was referred to the committee on appropriations, and at 1:40 Mr. Allison, from that committee, reported favorably the joint resolution, and it was immediately read three times and passed. Shortly afterward a message was received from the house announcing the affixing of the speaker's signature to the measure, whereupon the president of the senate instantly affixed his own.

A petition was presented from 1,100 settlers of Washington Territory asking protection in titles to the lands in controversy between them and the Northern Pacific. The bill regarding circulating notes of national banks was again debated. Adjourned till Monday.

HOUSE.—A joint resolution appropriating $200,000 more for the flood sufferers was introduced and adopted. The house adopted the majority report in the Manning-Chalmers contested election case, which declares the seat vacant until the case is settled upon its merits. Before the vote was taken Mr. Curtin created a laugh by conducting Mr. Manning to the speaker's desk and demanding that the oath of office be administered to him, which the speaker of course declined to do. Adjourned till Monday.

Murdered His Father.

A murder was unearthed about eight miles north of Adrian, Minn. Martin Riley a farmer, was a widower with three children, a boy about fifteen years old, and two girls aged eight and ten, respectively. Mr. Riley was in Adrian over a week ago, and that is the last which was known of him until the 13th. The neighbors and others inquired of the boy and oldest girl about their father's whereabouts, and were told that he had gone away to stay and had given them the farm and all the stock. A party of citizens searched the premises. They found bloody straw in the stable. This led to the search of a straw pile near by, and resulted in the discovery of the body buried head downward in the top of the stack. The body was naked, except a coffee sack, which was drawn down over the head and shoulders, and saturated with blood and frozen. This will not be removed until the coroner arrives. A gun was found in the house with one barrel discharged, and an axe was found on the premises covered with blood. There can be little doubt that the boy murdered his father, and that his sister, if not an accomplice, knew of it and helped to conceal the body. About the time of the disappearance of the father the son spent considerable money at the stores, and has been trying to hire a hand to help run the farm. The girls were taken in charge and turned over to the sheriff.

Prince versus Humbug.

An American spiritualist named Bastian gave a seance in the imperial palace Vienna, Austria, on the 15th, at the invitation of the Crown Prince Rudolph and Archduke John. Bastian summoned spirits from a room adjoining the exhibition hall, whereupon a tall figure in mourning appeared before the spectators. Suddenly the crown prince pulled a string closing the secret door, when the spirit, who was Bastian himself, made frantic but vain efforts to escape amid the laughter of the assemblage.

A Chicago Special says: Bastian, the American spiritualist, who was unmasked as a fraud by the crown prince of Austria, is well known here. A few years ago, connected with a man named Taylor, he had rooms in the building of the Religio-Philosophical Journal, a spiritualistic paper, and gave regular seances at which many startling spirit manifestations were made. Their career was brought to a close by B. C. Keeler, a reporter for the Times, who exposed the fradulent practices as thoroughly as done by the crown prince. The identity of the mediums and spirits, which they pretended to materialize was thoroughly established.

Sad Incident of the Flood.

At Cincinnati on Friday, the 15th, two buildings fell, on account of being undermined by the floods. They were occupied as boarding houses, by Robert Kyle and George Oyesler. There were about thirty-five people in the buildings at the time. The following are known to have been killed either by falling timber, or drowning: John W. Kyle, son of the proprietor, Mary E. Colter, Maud Ellis, James Ogden, Barney Winkler, Mrs. Winkler, Thomas Burke, Mrs. Lena Burk and two children, William and Louis Burke. Making ten lives so far known to have been lost.

The accident has spread terror among occupants of similar old buildings in the flooded district, and many who can do so are getting out to safer quarters. The body of Maud Ellis has been recovered. The body of another woman was found fast under a petition wall, but owing to the danger of other walls falling, further search was abandoned till the water falls.

Peaceful Lord Landsdowne.

At the annual meeting of the Dominion Artillery association Lord Landsdowne in a speech said:

You are not and I hope never will be a military nation in the sense in which some European powers are. Your people have their peaceful pursuits and are engaged in the development of the resources of the country. Your only coterminous neighbor is a great nation with which you are upon the most friendly terms, whose relations with you are absolutely unclouded. They are united to you by ties of descent, language and common love of free institutions. Again, you form part of an empire which you may depend upon will never quarrel with you gratuitously or for any purpose. For all these reasons the people of Canada are content to entrust what might be called national insurance to an army of very moderate size, supported at very cost and sacrifice of the time and attention to those who are members of different forces.

Swindling the Government.

Washington, Special. The committee of congress investigating the expenditures of the department of justice has summoned a large number of prominent Dakotians and ex-officials from other territories before them. It is alleged by some of the parties summoned that United States attorneys have made out and received pay upon vouchers for much larger sums than those assistants received. It is also asserted that enormous sums have been expended by these attorneys in commencing frivolous suits for the purpose of rolling up unwarranted fees in cases where a conviction was out of the question. Chairman Springer evidently intends to overhaul the federal officers receving fees in the territories.

Bismarck On His Ear.

The Berlin correspondent of the London Times says that Prince Bismarck has returned to Herr von Eisendscher, German minister at Washington, the resolution of condolence on Herr Lasker's death, passed by congress, with a counter request to return the resolution to the house of representatives, as the position of Lasker in Germany was not such as to justify the resolution. The Times adds: Although the above appears incredible, the fact is the relations of Washington and Berlin are in a great state of tension, chiefly owing to the pig flesh question. One thing is certain—we have not heard the last of the Lasker incident. The Americans are much too proud, too sensitive and too independent for that.

The German press say the submission of the Merv tribes to Russia is worse for England than the disasters in the Soudan. It comments upon the remarkable success of the Russian policy in Asia, which is always directed against England. If the Russians should stand again before the walls of Constantinople, the English would be disabled from commanding them to halt as in 1878. Russia will become the immediate neighbor of India, and will be able at any moment to create a disturbance in Northern India. Now only Afghanistan is between Russia and India, and the frontier tribes are ever ready to invade the rich Indian provinces if their roar is cowered, and they know that Russia can now guarantee them immunity.

Walter Wilson, who disappeared on the eve of his marriage at Montreal to a young lady there, and who is now in New York, has sent no explanation to the family of his fiancee. The indignation felt in the city against him for his heartless conduct is very intense. The young lady is ill.

A HUNTER'S STORY.

How he was Overcome and the Way by Which he was Finally Saved.

Correspondence Spirit of the Times.

An unusual adventure which recently occurred to your correspondent while hunting at Brookmere in this state is so timely and contains so much that can be made valuable to all readers, that I venture to reproduce it entire:

The day was a most inclement one and the snow quite deep. Rabbit tracks were plentiful, but they principally led in the direction of a large swamp, in which the rabbits could run without difficulty, but where the hunter constantly broke through the thin ice, sinking into the half-frozen mire to his knees. Notwithstanding these difficulties, the writer had perserved, although a very small bag of game was the result. While tramping about through a particularly malarial portion of the swamp, a middle aged man suddenly came into view, carrying a muzzle loading shot gun and completely loaded down with game of the finest description. Natural curiosity, aside from the involuntary envy that instinctively arose, prompted the writer to enter into conversation with the man, with the following result:

"You've had fine success, where did you get all that game?"

"It's pretty rough hunting in these parts, especially when a man goes up to his waist every other step."

"Yes, it's not very pleasant, but I am used to it and don't mind it."

"How long have you hunted hereabouts."

"Why, bless you, I have lived here most of my life and hunted up to ten years ago every year."

"How does it happen you omitted the last ten years?"

"Because I was scarcely able to move, much less hunt."

"I don't understand you?"

"Well, you see, about ten years ago, after I had been tramping around all day in this same swamp, I felt quite a pain in my ankle. I didn't mind it very much, but it kept troubling me for a day or two, and I could see it kept increasing. The next thing I knew, I felt the same kind of a pain in my shoulder and I found it pained me to move my arm. This thing kept going on and increasing, and though I tried to shake off the feeling and make myself think it was only a little temporary trouble, I found that it did not go. Shortly after this my joints began to ache at the knees and I finally became so bad that I had to remain in the house most of the time."

"And did you trace all this to the fact that you had hunted so much in this swamp?"

"No, I didn't know what to lay it to, but I knew that I was in misery. My joints swelled until it seemed as though all the flesh I had left was bunched at the joints; my fingers crooked in every way and some of them became double-jointed. In fact, every joint in my body seemed to vie with the others to see which could become the largest and cause me the greatest suffering. In this way several years passed on, during which time I was pretty nearly helpless. I became so nervous and sensitive that I would sit bolstered up in the chair and call people that entered the room not to come near me, or even touch my chair. While all this was going on, I felt an awful burning heat and fever, with occasional chills running all over my body, but especially along my back and through my shoulders. Then again my blood seemed to be boiling and my brain to be on fire."

"Didn't you try to prevent all this agony?"

"Try, I should think I did try. I tried every doctor that came within my reach and all the proprietary medicines I could hear of. I used washes and liniments enough to last me for all time, but the only relief I received was by injections of morphine."

"Well, you talk in a very strange manner for a man, who has tramped around on a day like this and in a swamp like this. How in the world do you dare do it?"

"Because I am completely well and sound as a dollar. It may seem strange, but it is true that I was entirely cured; the rheumatism all driven out of my blood; my joints reduced to their natural size and my strength made as great as ever before, by means of that great and simple remedy, Warner's Safe Rheumatic Cure, which I believe saved my life."

"And so you now have no fear of rheumatism?"

"Why, no. Even if it should come on, I can easily get rid of it by using the same remedy."

The writer turned to leave, as it was growing dark, but before I had reached the city precisely the same symptoms I had just heard described came upon me with great violence. Impressed with the hunters' story, I tried the same remedy, and within twenty-four hours all pain and inflamation had disapeared. If any reader is suffering from any manner of rheumatic or neuralgic troubles and desires relief let him by all means try this same great remedy. And if any readers doubt the truth of the above incidents or its statements let them write to A. A. Coates, Brookmore, N. Y., who was the man with whom the writer conversed and convince themselves of its truth or falsity.

The Beecher Family.

The question was raised recently whether Henry Ward Beecher was younger or older than his sister, Mrs. Stowe. It was found that Mrs. Stowe was born in 1812 and Mr. Beecher in 1813; he is a little more than one year the younger. Catherine Beecher was born nearly twelve years before her better known sister. While Catherine lost her lover, Prof. Fisher of Yale College, by shipwreck, when she was still very young, Mrs. Stowe married, it appears, a widower, if we are to trust E. D. Mansfield's "Memories," which say that "Prof. Stowe had for a first wife a handsome New England lady." Mr. Stowe was ten years older than his wife, who wrote her great work at the age of forty, and her second important novel, "Dred," at the age of forty-four. The Beecher family seem to owe their literary vitality to their transplantation to the West, where their father, Lyman Beecher, went about 1832, and he remained there many years. Mrs. Stowe lived in Cincinnati about seventeen years, or till the time that she planned "Uncle Tom," which novel was not drawn from Eastern or Virginia slave sources, but from Kentucky, and the escaping slaves who came up through Ohio and Indiana. Among these was Eliza Harris, whose feat of crossing the river with her child, on floating cakes of ice, is fully testified to in the recently published reminiscences of Levi Coffin, the President of the Western Underground Railroad, who sheltered her at his house.—"Gath" in New York Tribune.

Mrs. Thomas Bailey Aldrich is said to be the most picturesque lady in Boston.

My father had an eating cancer for several years, which had eaten away his under lip and the inside of his cheek, down to the bottom of his gums. We got some of Swift's Specific and gave him, and the effect has been wonderful—almost miraculous. The sores are all healed, and he is perfectly well. Every one said it was only a question of time about his death, and his cure has created the greatest excitement in this part of the country.

Twenty-four Hours to Live.

From John Kuhn, Lafayette, Ind., who announces that he is now in "perfect health," we have the following: "One year ago I was, to all appearance, in the last stages of consumption. Our best physicians gave my case up. I finally got so low that our doctor said I could not live twenty-four hours. My friends then purchased a bottle of Dr. Wm. Hall's Balsam For The Lungs, which considerably benefitted me. I continued until I took nine bottles. I am now in perfect health, having used no other medicine."

Pulmonary Consumption.
DEAR SIR:—I received the trial bottle of your White Wine of Tar Syrup which you sent to my address. My wife has been troubled with a lung disease for more than eighteen years, and was pronounced last January in the last stages of Pulmonary Consumption. She commenced taking your valuable medicine and received relief at once. She has used three bottles since and is now using the fourth, and her health is better than for many years. We cheerfully recommend it to all afflicted with any trouble of the throat or lungs. We now get our medicine through John Pyrter, our merchant at this place.
Yours Respectfully, Rev. J. B. Fly.

ALLEN'S Lung Balsam!
A GOOD FAMILY REMEDY!
—THAT WILL CURE—
Coughs, Colds, Croup,
CONSUMPTION.
Dr. Meredith, Dentist, of Cincin'ti, was thought to be in the last stages of Consumption, and was induced by his friends to try Allen's Lung Balsam after the formula was shown him. We have his letter that it at once cured his cough and that he was able to resume his practice.
Jeremiah Wright, of Marion County, W. Va., writes us that his wife had Pulmonary Consumption and was pronounced incurable by physicians, when the use of Allen's Lung Balsam entirely cured her. He writes that he and his neighbors think it the best medicine in the world.
Wm. C. Diggs, Merchant, of Bowling Green, Va., writes April 4, 1881, that he wants us to know that the Lung Balsam has cured his mother of Consumption, after the physician had given her up as incurable. He says others knowing her case have taken the Balsam and been cured. He thinks all so afflicted should give it a trial.
Wm. A. Graham & Co., Wholesale Druggists, Zanesville, Ohio, write us of the cure of Matthias Freeman, a well-known citizen, who had been afflicted with Bronchitis in its worst form for twelve years. The Lung Balsam cured him as it has many others of Bronchitis.
Allen's Lung Balsam
is harmless to the most delicate child! It contains no Opium in any form! Recommended by Physicians, Ministers and Nurses. In fact by everybody who has given it a good trial. It Never Fails to Bring Relief.

SKIN HUMOR.
My baby six months old broke out with some kind of skin humor, and after being treated five months by my family physician, was given up to die. The druggist recommended Swift's Specific, and the effect was as gratifying as it was miraculous. My child soon got well, all traces of the disease is gone, and he is as fat as a pig.
J. J. Kirkland, Minden, Rusk County, Texas.
I have suffered for many years from ulcers on my legs. Often very large and painful, during which time I used almost everything to effect a cure, but in vain. I took Swift's Specific by advice of a friend, and in a short time was cured sound and well.
Edwin J. Miller, Beaumont, Texas.
I have been afflicted with Scrofula for twelve years and have had sores on me as large as a man's hand for that length of time. Last summer I was so bad off that I could not wear clothing. I had spent hundreds of dollars in the effort to be cured, but all to no purpose, and had injured myself with Mercury and Potash. Your Swift's Specific cured me promptly and permanently, and I hope every like sufferer will take it.

Advice from Hempstead, Tex., give meager details of a fearful encounter, in which one man was killed and two others mortally wounded. For some reason or other, Will Wheeler and John Ellison, late city marshal, commenced shooting at each other in Hewes' bar-room Friday night, the 15th. Capt. James T. Browning interfered and tried to make peace. When the firing ceased it was discovered that Browning was shot dead and Wheeler and Ellison were in such a condition that they will probably die.

There was an exciting scene at a circus at Cairo, Egypt. An Italian acrobat unfurled an Italian flag, whereupon an English officer walked into the arena and seized it amid great excitement. The acrobat soon recovered the flag, however, and waved it triumphantly, when he was struck by a Frenchman. A melee ensued. Finally some English officers managed to separate the combatants and calmed the tumult. The Italian consul demanded satisfaction for the insult to the flag. It is hoped the affair will be amicably settled.

The following formal challenge was issued from Cleveland to Pugilist Sullivan: "I, Duncan C. Ross, will match Mervine Thompson of this city to spar John L. Sullivan with hard gloves to a finish, for from $1,000 to $5,000, ring rules to govern. I will deposit the money in the Ohio National bank, or with any responsible party agreeable to Mr. Sullivan, as soon as notified of his acceptance. Any communication addressed to this city will be attended to." The challenge is signed by Ross. The man and money are ready to meet Sullivan any time or place he may name.

At New York on Wednesday night, a glove fight took place in the presence of 300 people, between the heavy-weights, Capt. James C. Daly and Hial H. Stoddard. The fight was for a purse of $1,000, marquis of Queensbury rules. Prof. McClelland was referee. In the first round the men did some hard hitting, and blood flowed freely. When time was called both appeared exhausted. The second round was a repetition of the first. Daly was the more used up when time was called, and the third round Stoddard clinched his opponent and hurled him from the platform. The greatest excitement prevailed. Capt. McCullough, of the police, then stopped the fight.

The Recent Mad Waters.

CINCINNATI, Feb. 11.—The day has been one of the greatest excitement since the flood began. The stage of high water last year was passed at 1 p. m., and a steady and hard rain during the greater part of the day together with a report of general rains at every place where it would run into the Ohio, made it certain that a still more dangerous flood would be upon the already unfortunate people of the Ohio valley. The experience last year made the people bold in confronting the danger they once met and overcome, but when a new element of terror comes in the form of a heightened flood, a new series of calamities begin to appear. Gas was lost yesterday, and the water supply ceased to accumulate to-day. There is five days' supply in the reservoir with careful use, but one big fire would make serious inroad on that. The worst of all is, nobody knows when the limit of the flood will be reached. The rising of water above and in all side tributaries renders it certain that the river must continue to rise for some time. How long and how rapid the rise are points of conjecture and fear. The rate increased this afternoon to an inch an hour, and during the hour from 5 to 6 the rise was three-quarters of an inch. It is hardly possible to give an idea of the situation. The mass of the people cannot see the great body of the river. Approach to the banks has been cut off on all streets running to the river at Pearl street or near it. Those familiar with the city may gain an idea of its extent when it is stated that the water is now but little more than 600 feet from the Burnett house. From there to the river bank proper the distance is between three and four squares. All that can be seen is streets inundated and boats gliding in all directions. The suspension bridge, 100 feet above low water mark, makes a low arch above the mad flood. The Newport and Southern railroad bridges almost touch water. The view from Price's hill, in the western part of the city, gives of the flood covering a portion of the city. At the foot of the hill on the west side of the city, Mill creek spreads to an average of a mile expanse of water, and reaches north out of sight. Backwater runs beyond the Spring Grove cemetery a distance of seven miles up the river. Cincinnati, Covington and Newport houses can be seen peering out of the water, while down the river almost from hill to hill, the valley is covered. Up to this time, great as is the danger, there has been no great disaster. The cry of distress, however, is beginning to grow louder. Manufactories are stopping, and men thrown out of employment. In Newport it is estimated that 5,000 or 6,000 people are homeless, and their supplies were exhausted at noon.

GALLIPOLIS, Ohio, Feb. 11.—The relief committee sent to Pomeroy has just returned. Five thousand people are camped on the hills in terrible want for food and shelter. One hundred and fifty houses have floated away. Boats land at the court house steps. The people are haggard and worn out for sleep, food and shelter. Nearly every business man is bankrupt. The coal mines at Syracuse are flooded. A house went by Middleport this morning with a woman sitting on the gable end. Men rowed out and appealed to her to get off, but she refused, saying she had four babies below. A glass was broken and the children were seen floating dead.

MORE AND MORE SERIOUS.

CINCINNATI, Feb. 12, 12:30 a. m.—With the river a foot higher to-night than a year ago and rising at midnight an inch an hour, the situation becomes more and more serious. Up to to-night the Cincinnati, Hamilton & Dayton road has been able to reach its depot. It will be unable to get trains out in the morning. This leaves the Cincinnati Northern the only road able to take its transmission from its depot. It carries passengers for the Cincinnati, Washington & Baltimore, and for the Pan Handle out to the junction with the Cincinnati, Washington & Baltimore road, which road is used by the Pan Handle to Loveland. Trains on the Cleveland, Columbus, Cincinnati & Indianapolis road are obliged to stop at Chester Park, seven miles out. Ohio and Mississippi boats can no longer land at Storr's station, and will use a ferry to convey passengers to and from the boats. The Cincinnati Southern is arranging for a ferry to reach the depot at Gest street. The Kentucky Central and Chesapeake & Ohio have no water to trouble them. Five thousand distillery cattle, now at the stockyards, will have to be removed in the morning. The water has reached Chester park, and Maud S. and Kittson's horses will probably have to be removed from the stables. Covington has neither gas nor water.

THE MASONS

of this city have found it necessary to take decisive action, and issue the following appeal:

To the Masons of the United States: The Masons of Cincinnati represent that a calamity greater than ever known is now upon the Ohio valley. For hundreds of miles, not only Masons in great numbers, but thousands of men, women and children are homeless, cold and hungry. Every source of charity must be called on to relieve their distress. If any Masonic body desires to contribute to this noble purpose, remittances may be sent to the Masonic Flood Committee, Masonic Temple, Cincinnati.

All the Masonic bodies in the city will meet to-morrow to perfect arrangements for systematic relief. The river at 10 p. m., was sixty-eight feet tenth and one-fourth inches, and rising half inch per hour; raining hard.

APPEAL TO KNIGHTS OF HONOR.

TOLEDO, Feb. 12.—Following is an appeal issued by the supreme dictator of the Knights of Honor:

Supreme Lodge Knights of Honor, Toledo, Feb. 11, 1884.—Distress call to all lodges and Knights of Honor: Thousands of families are suffering from the awful floods in the Ohio and tributary streams. This only need be named to induce instant aid, much or little, from each of our 3,000 lodges and 130,000 members. The distress is too dire to await relief through a single channel. Aid sent by telegraph or otherwise to either of the following persons will be distributed in their own, neighboring or remote communities, to needy sufferers, whether they be of us or not: Col. Lewis Wilson, Cincinnati; G. G. Shofield, Wheeling, W. Va.; Judge Robert L. Breckenridge, Louisville, Ky.; Judge O'Key Johnson, Parkersburg, W. Va.; Thomas E. Richards, Zanesville, Ohio; John B. Ewan, Covington, Ky.; Roseman Gardner, Steubenville, Ohio; Rev. Thomas Boyle, Allegheny, Pa.; and W. B. Godfrey, New Albany, Ind. Sufferers in other communities will report their needs to one of the above.

[Signed] R. H. COCHRANE,
Supreme Dictator.

THE GOVERNMENT ACTING.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 12.—The secretary of war is taking active measures for the immediate relief of sufferers by the overflow of the Ohio and tributaries, in accordance with the act appropriating $300,000 for that purpose. Orders were issued to-day for Gen. Amos Beckwith, assistant commissary general stationed at St. Louis, to proceed to Cincinnati, where he will have general charge of the distribution of supplies. He will establish headquarters at Cincinnati and act directly under orders from the secretary of war. Orders were also issued for the purchase of supplies and the charter of a sufficient number of boats to distribute them where most needed. It has also been arranged that an officer of the army shall accompany each boat and superintend the issue of the supplies. The general plan of relief determined upon is the same as that pursued in affording relief to sufferers from the overflow of the Mississippi last year. In order to give his personal attention to this subject, Secretary Lincoln has abandoned his proposed trip to Chicago.

GOV. HOADLY PROCLAIMS.

COLUMBUS, O., Feb. 12.—The following proclamation was issued this evening:

To the people of Ohio: The distress existing along our western border cannot well be exaggerated. Many thousands of our fellow citizens are without food and shelter. The press has brought vividly to the attention of us all the details of the sorrow and suffering which the present flood has entailed upon our people. The duty of the citizens of Ohio is to furnish relief, and that immediately. I urge upon every community in the state to organize at once for the purpose of providing for the relief of their unfortunate fellow-citizens who live on the banks of the Ohio. Everything is needed and at every point along the state boundary, except at Cincinnati, which is taking care of her own sufferers. Money, clothing, shelter and food must be provided, and that speedily, or loss of life will be the result. An executive committee, of which E. W. Huntington is chairman, has been organized in Columbus. [illegible] the tide of distress which is overwhelming the borders of the state.

GEORGE HOADLY, Governor.

The Crown and the Pen.

LONDON, Feb. 11.—The queen's new book was distributed to the press this morning. It consists of a disconnected diary from Aug. 21, 1862, to September, 1882, with a long gap from October, 1879, to final date, covering the period of transition from the administration of Beaconsfield to that of Gladstone. The entire book is devoted to domestic and family affairs, political allusion being only incidental. The illustrations are numerous, and include portraits of the queen and Princesses Eleanor, Louise and Beatrice; also a portrait of Grant, the queen's body servant, and one of her attendants John Brown. There are pictures, too, of the queen's collie dogs, Sharp and Noble, and several views of scenes in the Highlands from sketches by Princess Beatrice. In the preface the royal authoress says:

Remembering the feeling with which our "Life in the Highlands" was received, the writer thinks the present volume may equally evoke sympathy; as, while describing a very altered life, it shows how her sad and suffering heart was soothed and cheered by the excursions and incidents it recounts, as well as by the simple mountaineers, from whom she learned many lessons of resignation and faith in the quiet of the beautiful Highlands.

THE PRINCE CONSORT.

After a dedication to the "Loyal Highlanders, and especially to the memory of our faithful attendant and friend, John Brown," the diary opens with the building of the memorial cairn in honor of the prince consort. It reads as follows:

We started off in a little pony chair, led by Brown, Bertie (prince of Wales) in front, Eleanor and Louise on ponies and the two little boys, Arthur and Leopold. I actually drove in the little carriage to the very top of Craig Lowrigan, Grant and Duncan pushing the carriage behind sweet baby Beatrice. We found at the top the view so fine, the day so bright, the heather so beautifully pink; but no pleasure, no joy—all dead. Here at the top is the foundation of a cairn to be erected to the memory of my precious Albert. I and my poor six orphans all placed stones on it, and our initials are to be placed on stones all around it.

Several succeeding entries in the diary mention other visits to the prince's cairn, along with family records and remarks of domestics. The following may serve as a sample of the latter:

When near the cairn, Grant said: "I thought you would like to be here to-day, on his birthday." So entirely was he of the opinion that this beloved day, and even the 14th of December, the anniversary of his death, must be looked upon as a day of mourning. There is so much good and strong faith in these simple people.

In October, 1863, when making an excursion from Balmoral to Clova, the carriage was overturned. The face and right arm of the queen were bruised, and Brown's knees were badly hurt. Succeeding entries recur to

BROWN'S INJURY.

I was much distressed at Belfast to find that poor Brown's legs had been dreadfully cut at the back of the knees, and he said nothing about it. But to-day one became so inflamed and swelled so much he could hardly move. The doctor said he must keep in as much as possible and walk very little, but did not forbid his going out with a carriage. I did not go out in the morning.

The next day, Oct. 12, the queen writes: "Brown's leg is much better. The doctor thought he could walk over the hill to-morrow." When making her first visit to Glassalt Shiel, a mountain lodge, in 1868, the diary describes the housewarming, as follows:

Brown came to say that all the servants were ready. There were present Louise, Arthur, Jane, Lady Churchill, a number of domestics and policemen. We made nineteen altogether. Five animated reels were danced, in which all but myself joined. After the first reel whisky toddy was brought round for every one, and Brown begged that I would drink to fire the kindling. The merry, pretty little ball ended at 11, but the men went on singing in the steward's room for some time. All were very happy, but sad thoughts filled my heart, both before dinner and when I retired to rest. I thought of my darling husband, whom I fancied I must see, and who always wished to build here. Then the sad thought struck me, "It is my first widow's house, but I am sure his blessing rests on it."

LOUISE AND LORNE.

October 3, 1870, Princess Louise became engaged to the Marquis of Lorne.

The event took place, says the queen, during a walk from Glassalt Shiel to Dhuiock, where Louise had gone with Lady Ely, the lord chancellor and Lorne. Louise on returning at night told me Lorne had spoken of his devotion to her, and proposed to her. She had accepted, kowing I would approve. Though I was not unprepared for this result, I felt painfully the thought of losing her, but naturally I gave my consent and could only pray she might be happy.

The conculding page is devoted to the death of Brown. It contains these sentences:

His loss to me is irreparable, for he deservedly possessed my entire confidence. He served me truly, devotedly, untiringly. To say that he is daily, nay hourly, missed by me, whose life-long gratitude he won by constant care and devotion, is but a feeble expression of the truth.

So far as its political interest is concerned, the book is throughout intensely disappointing. All the queen's remarks have direct relation to personal emotions. Even in her allusions to the Egyptian campaign and battle of Tel el Kebir, her only thought is for the safety of the duke of Connaught. The diary says: "On the eve of the attack, I prayed earnestly for my darling child and longed for the morning to come." The next day she gets a telegram announcing the great victory and reporting the duke was well and had behaved admirably, whereupon she says:

I have unbounded joy and gratitude. I showed the telegram to Beatrice and embraced her warmly, saying: "What joy and pride and cause for thankfulness we have to know that our darling is safe and so much praised." I feel quite beside myself with joy and gratitude, though grieved to think of our losses.

Wendell Phillips' Marriage.

Mr. Thomas G. Appleton, of Boston, says: "I suppose you are familiar with the story of Mr. Phillips' marriage? How a gentleman asked Mr. Sumner to act as escort to a young lady who was going to the convention at Albany, and Mr. Sumner, being unable to go, resigned in favor of Mr. Phillips. How Mr. Phillips acted as her escort, and lost his heart to her before he got back. How he called upon her often in this city, but was not admitted, owing to her feeble health, but finally he almost broke his way to her and offered her his hand. She said she would never marry a man unless he would swear eternal enmity to slavery; but it was not necessary for Mr. Phillips to take that oath; he had already sworn it in his heart. So they were married, and the story of loving devotion and perfect sympathy is as much a matter of public knowledge as such a sacred subject should be."

Senator Morgan's Start.

Senator Morgan, of Alabama, had a hard struggle when he began the practice of law. His shingle hung unnoticed for many months. Becoming desperate one day, he packed up his few books and started for the depot, determined to abandon his profession and go to Texas. He had reached the foot of the stairs which led to his office when he was accosted by an elderly man who inquired where John Morgan's law office was. "Right here, sir; my name is Morgan." "Going out?" "I am about to start for Texas on pressing business." "Indeed! Then can you direct me to a good lawyer? I've a little case to dispose of." "I decided," said Mr. Morgan afterward, in telling the story to a friend, "that my Texas trip was not so pressing after all. I took the old gentleman into my office and heard his case. I won it, and since that day fortune has favored me."

A leading lawyer of Tower City has just been visited by some female relatives from the East, and among them a sister seventeen years of age, who gave birth to an illegitimate child, which shortly after died. The surroundings of the case aroused suspicion, and a coroner's inquest was held this evening and resulted in the finding of suspicious indications.

SWEET FERN.

The subtile power in perfume found
Nor priest nor sybil vainly learned;
On Grecian shrine or Aztec's mound
No censor idly burned.

That power the holy Magian knew,
The dervish in his frenzied dance,
The Pythian priestess swooning through
The wonderful land of trance.

And nature holds, in wood and field,
Her thousand sun-lit censers still;
To spell of flower and shrub we yield
Against or with our will.

I climbed a hill-path strange and new
With slow feet, pausing at each turn;
A sudden waft of west-wind blew
The breath of the sweet fern.

That fragrance from my vision swept
The alien landscape; in its stead,
Up fairer hills of youth I stept,
As light of heart as tread.

With me June's freshness, lapsing brook,
Murmurs of leaf and bee, the call
Of birds, and one whose voice and look
In keeping were with all.

A fern beside the way we went
She plucked, and smiling, held it up,
While from her hand the wild, sweet scent,
I drank as from a cup.

O potent witchery of smell!
The dust-dry leaves to life return;
And she who plucked them owns the spell,
And lifts her ghostly fern.

Or sense or spirit? Who shall say
What touch the cords of memory thrills?
It passed; and left the August day
Ablaze on lonely hills.

—John Greenleaf Whittier.

WILD ASTERS.

It was a very charming little shopping bag, and Sadie had wanted such an one for a long time. When she discovered it on her dressing table her birthday morning, it pleased her more than all her other presents combined, though some were far more valuable.

Later in the day she said to her mother:

"Now, mother, you know—and if you don't, I do—that the very first time I carry this bag I'll leave it somewhere, as sure as sin."

"Yes; but, Sadie, you're old enough to be more careful."

"Very true, mother, but then I'm not; and I never shall be, I very much fear."

"Perhaps if you lose this it will be a lesson you will remember."

"But I don't intend to lose it, even if I do leave it; for I mean to have my full address engraved on this silver plate, instead of simply initials."

She had it engraved that afternoon, and displaying it in triumph, said,

"There, mother! see that! Now he who runs may read: Sadie M. Farnham, Pleasantville, Maine."

"Yes, perhaps somebody will read it whom you won't wish to," responded the mother sagely.

"O, I shall keep that side toward me when I carry it."

The last of September she went to visit her most intimate friend, Laura McOuisten, lately married, and living in Ohio. Laura's former home had been in Sadie's own village; and knowing Laura's fondness for the Wild Purple Aster which bordered all their roadsides, nestling beside the Golden-rod, she gathered a large bunch of them to carry to her friend, with but one gorgeous spray of Golden rod in their midst.

Her brother Harry found a pleasant seat for her in the car, and handing her the bag and flowers, he said.

"There! these are almost equal to a big box, little box, bandbox and bundle."

"Now Harry! you know father says I'm a finished traveler. I never burden myself or any one else with luggage."

"You'll get sick enough of those flowers before you get there; they'll be all withered, any way."

"No, they won't; for I shall put fresh water on the cotton every little while."

"Here are your tickets. Take care of yourself, and don't get into any scrapes. Good-bye little sis; remember me to Laura."

The car was empty save for a few passengers behind Sadie, whose faces she could not see. She loved dearly to study faces, herself unobserved, and began to wish the car would fill up. It did with a rush at the next station, every seat soon being full. Just as she was wondering who would occupy the seat with her, a rather elderly lady, with a slightly troubled expression, entered the car and looked anxiously up and down the rows of seats. She approached Sadie somewhat timidly, but Sadie lifted the flowers from the seat beside her and said brightly, "You can sit here if you like, madam." The lady—that she was a lady was written all over her, though evidently unused to travelling alone—thanked her with a very relieved face and sat down beside her. The lady's eyes fell at once to the flowers and lingered there. Sadie, who was watching her new travelling companion, saw from the half-tender smile which curved her lips, and the abstracted, dreamy look on her face, that she was far away from her present surroundings and busy with memories which the Asters and Golden-rod had stirred. As she looked up with a half sigh, Sadie said: "You love flowers?"

"O very much! Wild ones paticularly. I used to gather such as those when I was a little girl. I used to trim my sun-hat with them, and up by the old school house on the hill my girlhood's friend and I had a plot of them walled round with stones, I haven't seen them in years before, my home having been in the far West."

"I am taking these to a friend whose favorite flowers they used to be; but you must please accept half of them."

The lady thanked her but declined the gift, saying she could not rob her of them."

"You will not rob her, for I can send her a box full," separating the flowers as she spoke.

The lady's lips quivered, and her eyes grew moist as she gratefully accepted them. She told Sadie that she was on her way back to her home in the west, having made a hurried trip to the east to see her son who had been quite ill, but was now convalescent. Her immediate presence was required at home and she was obliged to return alone, the friend with whom she had come not returning for some weeks. "I am so unused to traveling alone that I am quite timid," she said with a deprecating look and smile.

Sadie did all in her power to make her comfortable as far as their ways lay together, and enjoyed her companionship, for she was very intelligent and cultured, as further conversation revealed. When they reached K——— they parted with real regret; Sadie, wishing the lady, whose name she did not know, a safe and pleasant journey.

Laura was delighted with the flowers, which had kept wonderfully fresh, more than delighted to see her friend, and in the happy busy days which followed, all remembrance of the lady with whom she had shared the flowers gradually faded from Sadie's mind.

One day there came a letter from home in Harry's hand writing which contained the following paragraph:

"The other day the expressman brought a box addressed to you. Mother was dying with curiosity to know what was in it. Of course, I had none, being a man, but at her solicitation I opened the box. It contained a beautiful panel painted in oils, of Wild Asters with a spray of Golden rod. Underneath lay a card, on one side of which was inscribed; "Geo. L. Cranstoun, Boston, Mass." On the other; "Will Miss Farnham please accept as a slight token of gratitude for kindness shown my mother while traveling?"

"I wrote to Charlie Livingston, inquiring in a casual way if he knew him. When he replied, he spoke very enthusiastically of him, and asked where I had met him. So father wrote to young C., acknowledging receipt of box, with thanks for contents.

"Now I should like to know, altho', as you know, I've no curiosity, what you've been up to. Wasn't my last charge to you a solemn warning not to get into scrapes?"

Laura declared it was most romantic, quite like a story; and when Sadie left for home she knew her departure was hastened by a desire to see that panel.

Sadie had no adventure during the homeward journey, having a seat to herself the most of the way. The remainder of it was occupied by an old gentleman who took snuff and had catarrh, saying "um! um!" in the most emphatic manner after each application of his handkerchief.

The panel was almost the first thing shown Sadie on her arrival.

"And how did you happen to give your name and address to an entire stranger?"

"Why I didn't."

"How did she know it, then?"

Just then Harry's eye happened to fall on the pretty bag with its silver plate. In a voice brimming with mischief he read: "Miss Sadie M. Farnham Pleasntville, Me.," and added: "I suppose you labelled yourself with that all the way, didn't you Sadie, like a package sent by express?"

"The idea! I kept the plate out of sight all the way; but I left it on the seat once when I went out to get some lunch."

"It's wonderful to me," said Harry, "that you didn't leave it somewhere altogether, that being your usual costom."

Autumn passed away, and early winter. With Christmas came another package by express to Sadie in care of her father. The box when opened was found to contain a beautiful lace pin, the design a spray of Asters, from Mrs. Cranstoun. Later came a very charming letter from the lady, begging Sadie's acceptance of the gift.

All the young readers are saying, "Why doesn't she hurry up and tell where Mr. Cranstoun came to see Sadie, made love, and was accepted?"

My dear girls, I leave you to imagine that part, and I will simply tell you that Mr. C. came up with Charlie Livingston at New Year, and when the Asters bloomed again there was a quiet wedding at which Sadie Farnham and George Crasntoun were central figures.

And the bride wore Astors instead of orange blossoms—how odd!

A strange story of wandering, hardship and final return to his native land as heir to a fortune came to light at Philadelphia, Wednesday, concerning a young Scotchman of high family named William Anderson. About two years ago he had a disagreement with his father, a wealthy, conservative gentleman of the old school. His parent's stern Presbyterian code prevented him from winking at some of his son's escapades, and the latter, in hot-headed haste, left his home near Inverness and took a sailing vessel for Liverpool, whence he came to New York. His habits cost him the situation he found on his arrival, and he went to work as porter in a Bowery carpet store. He went to Denver, and became a cowboy. He returned to Chicago as a vagrant, and as such reached Philadelphia. Lodging was given him at the Broad street station January 22 and at the sixth district the Saturday following. At the rooms of the local Scotch society he claims little attention was paid to him. In a deplorable state of need he wandered from door to door. In Chesnut street he was given a cold lunch with a piece of the Ledger wrapped about it. Chancing to look at the letter list he saw his name. Without much faith in the result he called at the postoffice and received a letter which had been sent to him at "North" Eighteenth street, New York, and forwarded to Philadelphia. Attorneys announced to him in this communication the death of his sister a year previous, the recent demise of his father, and the fact that $30,000 awaited his claim. He said Wednesday that if he had not happened to look at his name in the letter list he probably would not have learned of the state of affairs at all, as he had determined to die rather than to write or to return to his home. When he made known the facts he had learned to G. W. Childs that gentleman immediately purchased him an outfit and a ticket for Liverpool. He sailed Wednesday on the steamer British Prince. He says he thinks he will go back to Colorado and buy a ranch.

A Consular Humorist.

From the Boston Globe.

Mr. Bret Harte is United States Consul at Glascow; or, to be more accurate, he is United States Consul seldom at Glascow. He is also humorist. In his latter capacity he sent a letter to the Secretary of State, asking to be informed, in his former capacity, as to the views of the department concerning the definition to be given to the phrase "at the last port or place whence exported to the United States." The joke worked admirably. The estimable old lady at the head of the State Department found the problem too deep for her, and transmitted Mr. Harte's letter to the Treasury Department. Secretary Folger wrestled with the question and used about four sheets of foolscap in replying that "the last port" meant the last port. Then an appraiser at Philadelphia got mixed up in the joke, and Assistant Secretary French wrote him a long letter explaining that "the form of expression, 'last port or place,' was used so as to distinguish the last port or place of shipment from any prior port or place from which it might be shipped."

Business Habits in the Church.

From the Episcopal Register.

One thing that is very pleasing to the Christian eye is the improvements in the business habits of parochial administration. The pew rent is considered the most sacred debt they owe. The monetary arrangements for paying the salary of the clergy on the day it falls due helps the clergy themselves to be prompt in settling their own obligations. We believe in nothing has this age seen a more marked advance than the prompt payment of religious dues. A corresponding improvement has come in the reputation of the ministry for accurate and economic management of their incomes, and we doubt not that the average reputation of the clergy as good pay has never been so great as at present. Many of the systematic men in the ministry are graduates of the counting house as well as of the college, and it cannot be too seriously impressed on young men looking forward to the ministerial life that they should get what business training they can find, either in the intervals of seminary vacations, or in connection with their studies. Business habits are nowadays indispensable to clerical influence.

The Origin of Worcestershire Sauce.

Although inferior in money-making power to a pill, a sauce, too, can make the guineas roll briskly in, and notably has this been the case with Worcestershire. A scrutiny of the label will show that it is prepared "from the recipe of a nobleman of the county." The nobleman is Lord Sandys, and Messrs. Lea & Perrins's connection with the sauce came about rather curiously. Many years ago, Mrs. Grey, author of the 'The Gambler's Wife' and other novels, well known in their day, was on a visit at Omberaley Court, when Lady Sandys chanced to remark that she wished she could get some very good curry-powder; which elicited from Mrs. Grey that she had in her desk an excellent recipe, which her uncle, Sir Charles, Chief Justice of India, had brought thence and given her. Lady Sandys said that there were some clever chemists in Worcestor, who perhaps might be able to make up the powder; at all events, when they drove in after luncheon they would see. Messrs. Lee & Perrins looked at the recipe, doubted if they could procure all the ingredients, but said the would do their best, and in due time forwarded a packet of the powder. Subsequently the happy thought struck some one in the business that the powder might, in solution, make a good sauce. The experiment was made, and by degrees the thing took amazingly. All the world to its remotest ends, now knows of Worcestershire sauce as an article of commerce; and notwithstanding that, in common with those good things, it is terribly pirated, an enormous trade is done in it. The profits, I am told, amount to thousands of pounds a year, and the firm [illegible] but suppose that liberal checks have been paid to Mrs. Grey, to whom it is so heavily indebted for its prosperity.—London World.

Woman Suffrage In England.

Letter to the Editor of the Pall Mall Gazette.

The advocates of woman's suffrage and of woman in public work are fond of taking it for granted that their opinions are gaining ground in the Liberal Party. For myself, with fair opportunities of judging, I doubt it. The experience of the election of guardians is not favorable to them, and with regard to woman on school boards and other public bodies, where are the cases in which they have been of service? Unfortunate in public business as in private life, it is found that women are apt to form their opinions by their likes and dislikes, and to be moved by personal reasons rather than by the merits of the questions at issue, and this has made them often the cause of ill-feeling and discomfort in the boards on which they have sat. There has been nothing in the work which they have contributed to counterbalance this. They have done nothing which could not have been as well or better done by men. They often expect while sitting on public boards as much deference as all men are glad to render them in their own drawing room, and are sometimes as huffy and waspish in the one place as in the other when they do not get it. There are cases in which woman have distinctly lowered the character of the boards on which they sit, as some men of the best qualifications for the work decline to sit with them.

Personal Gossip.

Ernest Frederic William Klinkerfues, a well known astronomer, shot himself in the observatory at Gottingen Monday. There is no explanation of the act, unless Young's line, "The undevout astronomer is mad." Klinkerfues was 56 years old and has been director of the Gottingen observatory for 25 years, succeeding Gauss. He has discovered several comets and calculated their courses, and he has invented many valuable instruments, among them the bifilar, or two-threaded hygrometer, for measuring the moisture of the atmosphere. He has written several treatises on special subjects of astronomy and meteorology.

A farmer from Pocahontas county, West Virginia, appeared in Staunton the other day searching for an auction block and an auctioneer. He had cultivated his farm all these years in ignorance of the emancipation proclamation.

While abroad last summer, Rev. Hugh Elder, pastor of the Crombie-street Congregational Church in Salem, Mass., preached at the University Chapel in Edinburgh, Scotland, and to such acceptance that he was asked if he would entertain a call to become its pastor. He at that time emphatically refused, but about ten days ago he received a unanimous call, and on Sunday he detained his congregation and stated the case, saying that he left it with the people to decide the matter, Mr. Elder is warmly beloved, and it is hoped that he will remain in Salem.

M. Ruel is a sort of French Holloway. He began life by selling matches, and then became the largest manufacturer of them in France, his wealth being estimated at 25,000,000 francs. One of his charitable enterprises was to start a restaurant for the poor in the Rue de Rochehowait, Paris, at which a hearty dinner can be obtained for 10 cents, and of which an average of 6,000 paupers avail themselves daily. He has now, from equally human motives, built the Hotel Beau Revage at Cannes, where invalids, compelled to go there for their health, can have board and lodging for from 7 to 12 francs a day.

Dutcan D. Grandpre is the name of an eccentric old recluse who recently died in Montreal. After having amassed a snug fortune, some thirty years ago, Grandpre retired from business. He bought a costly coffin made of walnut, elegantly lined on the inside, and decorated on the outside with silver handles, etc. This he made his sleeping accommodation up to the time preceding his death. He once got nearly asphyxiated by the lid of the coffin falling down and excluding the air. His perilous position, however, was discovered in time, but not too soon to save him. This warning caused him to abandon his strange bed, but the shock he received then probably caused his death years afterward.

Bulwer's Gambling.

Early one morning Bulwer, the novelist, returned to his hotel from a gambling house, where he had been passing the last hours of the night. For the first time in his life he had played high; and, with the insidious good fortune so frequently attendant on the first steps along what would otherwise be the shortest and least attractive pathway to perdition, he had gained largely. The day was dawning when he reached his own rooms. His writing-desk stood upon a console in front of a mirror; and pausing over it to lock up his winnings, he was started and shocked by the reflection of his face in the glass behind it. The expression of the countenance was not only haggard, it was sinister. He had risked far more than he could afford to lose; his luck had been extraordinary and his gains were great. But the ignoble emotions of the night had left their lingering traces in his face, and as he caught sight of his own features still working and gleaming with the fever of a vicious excitement he, for the first time, despised himself. It was then he formed a resolution that, be the circumstances what they might, no inducement, whether of need or greed, should again tempt him to become a gambler.

MINNESOTA RAILROADS.

Commissioner Baker's Annual Report—Summary of the Document.

The annual report of Gen. James H. Baker, Railroad Commissioner, to the Governor of the State has just been issued from the press. It embraces a great deal of matter of special interest to certain classes of readers, but to the general public a synopsis will be more satisfactory than extended extracts.

The report, enters much less exhaustively than its predecessor into the discussion of the certain phases of the railroad problem, the relation between the companies and the state, and the questions at issue between some portions of the community and the corporations. On these wider subjects of consolidation, discrimination, pooling, and the establishment of efficient control by state authorities, the commissioner contents himself with a reference to the general conclusions reached and advanced by him a year ago.

The inequality and injustice of the present practice in grading passes under review, and the commissioner suggests the establishment of a system of state inspection, with provision for the training of capable inspectors, having for its objects both the accomplishment of justice to the farmer, and the general elevation and improvement of the farming industry of the state. The complete separation of the elevator control, and the buying and selling of grain is urged as a pre-requisite to any system of fair competition. A reduction of freight rates is earnestly recommended, on the basis of policy as well as generosity. The concluding paragraph of Gen. Baker's treatment of it will sufficiently express his views.

In summing the whole situation, with the best light obtainable as to grievances and remedies, it appears to us that if an honest and fair system of state inspection were adopted, based and modeled on the Illinois law; if all elevators and grain warehouses were made strictly public warehouses, and their business divorced from that of buying grain; and finally, if the shipping of grain was made open and free to all persons whomsoever, as by law and justice it ought to be, then by the operation of these agencies, the injuries now complained of would gradually cease, and this business, like other pursuits, resolve itself by the laws and forces which govern unfettered trade.

The smallness of the compensation received by railway employes is adverted to. It is pointed out that 188 persons were killed in railroad accidents during the year, an increase over the last of 21, while the number of injured shows a decrease of 32. The casuality list is compared with that of states having a much greater mileage, and it is urged by some action should be taken to provide for the greater safety of employes.

And another, quite as excellent and vastly more important, asks our congressional delegation to exert themselves in favor of the removal of the bonded charges and petty restrictions which are losing to us the traffic of Manitoba; a traffic that is ours by natural right, though in danger of permanent diversion by reason of artificial obstructions. Matters of history or detail with reference to the various lines, together with a brief treatment of the taxation of railway lands, cover the remainder of the report. The above with the following summary will give a good idea of the scope of the report:

During the year closing Dec. 1, 137.4 miles of railway have been built, making total of, 3,005.38 within the borders of the state, as compared with 3,769.13 miles in 1882. There has been some change in mileage since the last report by the material alteration of track of some of the roads; also the official report changes the mileage, as estimated by the commissioner, of some of the branches reported last year. The net gain in the state to Dec. 1 is 136.25 miles. Of the seventy-nine counties in the state, seventy-three are now supplied with reasonable railway facilities. The total cost of all miles of railway operated in the state up to June 30 was $159,071,150.44. The average cost per mile of railway operated in the state up to June 30 was $43,068.66. The total amount given to these railways by the people of Minnesota, in lands and bonds, on a cash basis, was $76,063,000. The average amount per mile, given to these railways by the people of Minnesota in lands and bonds, on a cash basis, was $20,432. The passenger earnings of all lines in the State of Minnesota for the year ending June 30, was $5,818,254.02. The average rate per passenger per mile in the State of Minnesota was 2.84 cents (Estimated). The average amount received from, or the earnings from each passenger in the State of Minnesota, was $1.31. (Estimated). The total number of passengers carried during the year, was 4,413,775. TAXES UPON GROSS EARNINGS.

table increase in the taxes from gross is a marked feature of the year. xes upon gross earnings for the year were $415,222.99; for 1882, $813,-—an increase of .47 per cent in a sinar. Some of this increase is due revenue of the commission. These taxes go first for the nt of interest on the refunded debt old state railroad bonds, the interest ch, for this year, amounts to $177,- There is also applicable to this special fund the interest on the internal imnant land fund, which now amounts to 30,000 per annum. The residue of es upon gross earnings goes into the y for the benefit of the state institund. It is probable that $12,467, with penalty and interest, will yet have to be added to the taxes of 1881, as the suit against the Northern Pacific Railroad company has been decided in favor of the state by the district court. Should the decision be affirmed by the supreme court, of which there is little doubt, the taxes for 1881 will be increased by that amount.

An Apology.

George the Third was popular with the English people. They represented him for the purity of his domestic life, and called him "Farmer George" on account of his plebeian ways and his good nature.

The King loved to mingle familiarly with his subject and cared little for court etiquette which made a hedge about him.

One day, while returning from hunting, the King entered into conversation with his wine-merchant, Mr. Cabornel. The two rode side by side a long way, much to the distress of Lord Walsingham, the gentleman-in-waiting.

Watching his opportunity, his lordship took the the merchant aside and whispered something in his ear. "What'sthat? What's that Walsingham has been saying to you?" asked the good-humored King, seeing that the merchant appeared annoyed.

"I find, sir," said the merchant, "that I have been unintentionally guilty of disrespect to your Majesty. My lord informs me that I ought to take of my hat whenever I address your Majesty. But your Majesty will please to notice that my hat is fastened to my wig and my wig is fastened to my head, and I am on the back of a spirited horse. So that if anything goes off, we must all go off together."

The King laughed heartily at the apology, and bade the merchant keep on his hat.

GOTHAM.

Letter to Troy Times.—While men die, New York lives. Her merchant princes pass away, but the city survives the loss in the rush of an increasing population. The tremendous centralization of the business of the continent on this spot forces it to a ceaseless growth, and then the centering of trade in certain localities here leads to values which really seem fabulous. In the more common streets of this city land is worth from $2,500 to $360,000 per acre. In the best part of Broadway its valeu is increased to $2,000,000 per acre, but in the vicinity of Wall street its value is immensely increased, because this locality is the money heart of America. The land on which the Drexal building stands cost its present owner at the rate of $14,000,000 per acre. It occupies the corner of Wall and Broad streets, which may be considered the most valuable corner on this continent, and yet, when I was a Broad street clerk, in 1840, this very place was occupied by a hat store. The corresponding value of property in this neighborhood has been illustrated by the recent sale of the corner of Broad street and Exchange place, which was at the rate of $15,000,500 per acre.

Standing on the Drexel corner you may see men entering their offices with rapid step, and if you could follow them you would find that their transactions, though of enormous sums, were accomplished with the smallest amount of words imaginable. No time to waste, when so much is to be done in a few hours. The day here is from 10 to 3 o'clock, and one house, (Trevor & Colgate), closes an hour earlier. Such men are always ready to act, hence there is less need to talk. If any one attempts a conversation he will find himself politely but positively neglected. Men may talk at their leisure, but not in the heaving and excited street. Across from Drexel's is the United States treasury, where $80,000,000 of government funds are held, and the rear of the treasury on Pine street) faces the great Turner building. Close by is the old solid firm of Vermilye & Co., who are very successful bankers. All around, as you cannot but feel, is wealth, not in lands, or in any representative shape, but in money. Here money reigns. Money is the theme. Moneyed men are only important, and if you want to see them, just come to this centre of capital.

The tendency of business to centralize renders the largest structures profitable, and the Produce-Exchange covers an acre and a half. Its rental will include 300 offices, and the latter are in demand at high rates throughout the business part of the city. D. O. Mills charges $9 per square foot on the best floors of his immense building. Thus an office 15x20 will contain 300 square feet, and therefore will rent for $2,700 per year. The Boreel building in Broadway, being more distant from the financial centre, is cheaper, and yet one would think it dear enough, since the rent is $6 per square foot. These buildings yield rich returns, and generally pay from ten to fifteen per cent. on the investment. In the course of a few years the entire lower part of the city will be covered with buildings of this kind, and the adjacent landholders will form companies and their property will be represented by shares of stock.

Generated Poisons.

There are three views respecting the origin of most infectious diseases.

The first is that they originate from impalpable poisons, produced from filth during some of the chemical changes which its particles undergo in certain conditions.

A second is that they are due to living organisms, mostly microscopic plants, introduced into the system through the mouth or lungs, the product of living germs outside of the body.

The third is in part like the second, but it claims that the living germs, are generated directly, apart from all parent germs, from elementary particles of filth, during the various processes of their decomposition and recomposition.

The last view is held by the advocates —not a large number—of the theory of "spontaneous generation."

The first is the old view, and is still maintained by many strong advocates. The second is a wholly modern view, and rests mainly on the discovery of the parasites by the microscope.

Filth, however, lies at the basis of every view, even the second holding that filth is a hot-bed for the rapid growth and multiplication of the germs, and that its influence on the human system is to lower its vitality and thus make it good soil for their development. Hence these diseases are now universally known as filth diseases.

The following are fresh illustrations of the connection between disease and filth. A severe epidemic of diptheria recently broke out in the Blind Asylum, Batavia, N. Y. An investigation by the State Board of Health showed that the drain, which conducted the sewerage to a swamp back of the institution had fallen in pieces and was wholly blockaded by the surrounding earth.

One of the citizens of Chelsea, a well-known lawyer, lately died from a very violent attak of typhoid fever. A child had recently recovered from the same disease. This same child had previously had attacks of scarlet fever and diptheria. The house was a fine one, and everything that met the eye was scrupulously neat. But on tearing up the basement floor—at the urgent request of the family physician—there was found beneath an immense mass of filth, the sewerage-pipe being broken in two places.—Youth's Companion.

A Remarkable Find.

Ex-Secretary Robson told the following story the other day about a pale stone which he wears in his watch-chain: "It was worn by my grandfather long before I was born, and one day while surveying in the woods on the old property around Oxford he lost it. Forty years afterwards my father, then a young man, was appointed the administrator of the Jacob Kale estate in Warren county, N. J. Among the assets he found this stone; he recognized it, and upon investigation found that ten years previously it had been found by Mr. Kale in the woods where my grandfather had lost it. It had lain there for thirty years. It ain't worth much, but it would take a good deal of money to buy it."

Mary Anderson has invited members of the dramatic profession in London to a free performance by her at the Lyceum on the 11th.

A Humorist Grows Poetical While Whirling Over Pennsylvania Mountains.

R. J. Burdette in Burlington Hawk-Eye.

The train is in the air so much of the time you think you are flying. And not merely flying over little culverts and seven by nine creeks, but jumping from one mountain to another. At Quakake Junction you can stand on the mountain side and look at the mountain until your eyes ache and then rest them on one of the lovelies, broadest valleys the sun ever laughed upon. And by and by the flying begins. As you near McAuley's Mountain, you begin to see some splendid railroad engineering work, and at Ringtown you enjoy the first flyer, a little swing across the Catawissa on a bridge 1,210 feet long and 135 feet high. You keep your face glued to the window, for there isn't a mile of scenery fit to be missed now. Catawissa Mountain looms up in broken lines ank rugged grandeur, and the man who can describe the scenery on the creek at Stranger Hollow doesn't write with my pen.

Mountains upon mountains and mountains behind them again draw you from one side of the car to the other, until you fairly weary of grandeur and have run out of adjectives twenty miles ago. As the Nescopec Mountains hold the skies up for you to run under, you catch your breath and make the leap and away we go across Long Hollow bridge, 1,050 feet long and 125 feet high; then, before you have scarcely time to pull yourself together, here they come, close as hurdles in a circus ring, Fisher's bridge, 755 feet long and 124 feet high, with a valley to look at that charms you into forgetfulness of the bridge; then Mine Gap bridge, 600 feet long and 103 feet high; hoopla! Mainville bridge, 700 feet long and 110 feet high—breezy work, isn't it?

And so we go, jumping creeks and rivers, on past Catawissa, and here we are at Danville, capital of Montour, Pennsylvania, and who wouldn't go to Danville down a road so airy and beautiful?

A Maiden's Idea of Marriage.

So she was going to be married! to be mistress of a house; settle in London; be able to go out into the streets all alone, to shop or visit; have a gentleman all her own, which she could put her finger on any moment, and make him take her about, even to the opera and the theater; to give dinner parties her ownself, and even a little ball once in a while; to buy whatever dresses she thought proper, instead of being crippeled by an allowance; have the legal right of speaking first in society, instead of sitting mumchance and mock modest; to be mistress instead of miss—a contemptible title; to be a woman instead of a girl; and all this rational liberty, domestic power, and social dignity were to be obtained by merely wedding a dear fellow who loved her and was so nice; and the bright career to be ushered in with several delights, each of them dear to a girl's very soul; presents from all her friends; as many beautiful new dresses as if one was changing her body or her hemisphere instead of her name; eclat; going to church, which is a girl's theater of display and temple of vanity, and there tasting delightful publicity and whispered admiration in a heavenly long veil which she could not wear even once if she remained single. This bright and variegated picture of holy wedlock, as revealed to young ladies by feminine tradition, though not enumerated in the Book of Common Prayer, so entranced her that time flew by unheeded.—Charles Reade.

The Test of a Woman's Beauty.

A ball dress is not the test of a woman's actual beauty; and many a woman bewitching in home attire is insignificant in grande toilette. Mr. Ruskin, whose passion for destroying institutions fallen into abuse is equalled only by his inspiration for suggesting better ones, has lately raised a question as to the propriety of girls being wooed and won in the gay world, "where, in a miserable confusion of candlelight, moonlight, and anything but daylight in indirectly-attractive and insanely expensive dresses, in snatched moments, in hidden corners, in accidental impulses and dismal ignorances, young people smirk and ogle and whisper and whimper and sneak and stumble and flutter and fumble and tumble and blunder into what they call love." However, there is another side to the picture, although many a man has probably had the instinct of the French marquis, just married to a young wife, looking so radiantly beautiful that, after gazing at her admiringly for a time, he tore her gown to pieces by way of preventing others from enjoying such a sight. The marquise no doubt returned her husband's devotion, for she regretted neither the dress nor the ball, and declared herself flattered beyond measure and proud of "this unique proof of his admiration."—Lippincott's.

A Plucky Clerk.

Among the clerks in the Treasury Department at Washington is a young man who was found buried among the dead on the field of the second Bull Run. When the burial squad pulled him out from among the dead he was found to have a terrible wound in the side, and his left hand was hanging by a few tendons. These he bit off and threw the hand away, gave his canteen to a dying Confederate and crawled off toward the hospital, prefering to help himself, so that the squad could search for others who might be in the same fix. The next day he recieved his commission as lieutenant. He married the sister of the Confederate to whom he gave the last drop of water he had.

Miss Anthony's Letter.

Miss Susan B. Anthony has written a circular letter to all the members of the House of Representatives who were not present when it was decided not to continue a committee on woman's suffrage, asking them which way they would have voted had they been present, the idea being, if there is any chance of success, to bring the resolution up again. The letter is written by Miss Anthony's secretary and signed by Miss Anthony. One of the members, noticing that the word suffrage was written sufferage, enclosed it to the Committee on Civil Service with a note, expressing some surprise that an old school teacher should pass over such an error.

THE FARM AND FIRESIDE.

Farming Brevities.

Seeding old pastures does not always thicken the sod, as the old roots do not allow the younger grasses an opportunity to take hold.

The grape thrives well on rich loamy soil, or on the poor, gravely hillsides. Like other vines, however, it does best when well cultivated and carefully managed.

The Husbandman reports that gas lime, after lying two years, had given proof of value as a fertilizier, though the first year it appeared to injure the wheat.

In some sections of the south the Bermuda grass is being cultivated. Once rooted it is hard to eradicate, but as it seems to thrive well during seasons of drought it has been used as pasturage in preference to less hardy grasses.

The claim that stumps may be extracted by boring holes into them and filling the holes with saltpeter has not been borne out by facts. It does well in a dry season, but the stumps burn easily, without the aid of saltpeter, during such periods.

Agriculture, says the Journal of Agriculture, should never be entirely divorced from horticulture. A farm is not a whole farm unless there is somewhere a home upon it, and a true rural home cannot be without shade trees and fruit trees and lawn and garden. Agriculture may provide the income, but horticulture makes the home. The beauties and delicacies of the farm proceed more from the orchard and garden than from the farm; and the farmer who ignores horticulture is ignoring one source of comfort and happiness.

The New York Times says that time seems to be a preventitive of rot in potatoes in the cellar. Some potatoes that were rotting and were picked out of a heap of forty or fifty bushels were put into a corner and well dusted with air slacked lime. They stopped rotting at once, and the decayed parts are now dried up. There is no disagreeable smell about them.

Those who have meadow land that has been drained and seeded down to the better qualities of grasses often find it necessary, the Massachusetts Ploughman says, to apply a dressing of sand, experience teaching that it very much improves the condition of the grass roots and increases the crop of grass; sometimes quite as much as a dressing of manure. The reason why this is so, few stop to inquire. The application of sand to a meadow often accomplishes a double purpose. First, it lightens up the soil and gives the water a chance to drain off, and second, it furnishes a silica to the grass, which is necessary to strengthen the stalk.

An old farmer, who has carefully tested the matter thinks that he can secure better results from scalding the feed for his cattle than by steaming or any other method of cooking. He puts the cut feed in his trough, pours in hot water and then puts on meal, then follows up with more hot water and closes the tank. This operation is done in the morning, and by evening the food thus prepared will be soft and palatable. He always prepares in the morning the feed that will be used in the evening, and vice versa. Stock feed in this manner will come out at the end of the winter in fine condition and with smooth and glossy hair, indicating perfect health.—Stockman.

A correspondent of Vicks' Magazine says: There are very few people not fond of lettuce in the early spring. Having removed from the city where early lettuce could be bought at the markets, I was much at a loss for this refreshing salad plant—at least, until quite warm weather. Knowing it to be quite hardy, I last autumn sowed some seed in a warm, dry spot, and in a week or two the plants were up. Before hard frost I placed around my little patch some boards,—to be particular, an old door frame—and over this some loose boards, covering about two-thirds of the space, so that there was about one-third uncovered for light and air. It was where it got the best of the sun, sloping southeast, and it was a surprise to find how early I had young lettuce from that rude bed. Of cource, this will be no benefit to those who have hot beds and other conveniences for forcing vegetables, but to very many of your readers I think the knowledge may be useful.

Some fruit growers are of the opinion that there is no cure for jellows on peach trees, but claim that the disease may be prevented by judicious management. Peach trees should be cultivated, not ploughed, and kept clean for the first three or four years. After that time a grass crop may be permitted but the land should be annually broadcasted with some fertilizer rich in potash. The borers must be kept away, and all dead branches carefully removed.

Helpful Hints.

Vegetables should be steamed or boiled rapidly.

A few drops of ammonia in the bathing-tub cleanses the skin wonderfully.

It is stated that a dried apple is greatly improved by the addition of a beaten egg.

The dust may be easily removed from a carpet by covering the broom with a damp cloth.

Pastry should be mixed as cold as possible, and kneaded slightly, rolled out and baked immediately.

Two parts of linseed oil and one of alcohol make an excellent varnish fo furniture. Apply with a soft rag.

Bags made of Canton flannel, drawn over the broom, are very useful for dusting walls and hard-wood floors.

A piece of mosquito netting, slightly damp, is considered by many the best thing to dust painted wood-work with.

A few drops of a solution of glycerine a little camphor rubbed on the hands while damp will render them soft and comfortable.

High medical authority recommends the use of vaseline for relieving the burning and itching sensation of the eruption of scarlet fever. Three or four applications to the surface of the body will usually suffice.

Good Old Disinfectant.

When the household of our grandmothers was threatened with infection, the common practice was to sprinkle brimstone on a hot shovel or on hot coals on a shovel, and carry the burning result through the house. But now this simple method of disinfecting has gone out of fashion without any good and sufficient reason. The principal reason is neither good nor sufficient, viz., that nobody can patent it and sell it in twenty-five and fifty cent bottles. On the 18th of September last, M. d'Abbadie read a paper at the French Academy on "Marsh Fevers," and stated that in dangerous regions of African river-mouths immunity from such fevers is often secured by sulphur fumigations on the naked body. Also that the Sicilian workers in low-ground sulphur mines suffer much less than the rest of the surrounding population from intermittent fevers. M. Fouque has shown that Zepheria (on the volcanic island of Miloor or Milos, the most westerly of the Cyclades) which had a population of forty thousand when it was the centre of sulphur mining operations, became nearly depopulated by marsh fever when the sulphur mining was moved farther east and the emanations prevented by a mountain from reaching the the town. Other similar cases were stated.—Hall's Journal of Health.

Castor Oil for Shoe Leather.

There is one simple article which will render any decently-made boot thoroughly impervious. It is nothing more nor less than cold-drawn castor oil, "pure and simple." It is best applied before a moderate fire. The boots to be dressed should be quite clean and dry, and special care should be given to the welt and the tongues, and their stitching to the upper leathers. I generally begin by pouring the oil from the bottle all around the welt so that the angle between the sole and upper leather is quite filled with oil, and then proceed all over the boot, including the edges of the soles, rubbing it in with the hand. When one is done, have a turn at the other, and so alternately till you have got in about a tablespoonful and a half to each boat. The tongues, being thinner leather, should be quite saturated. Subsequent dressing will not require so much oil. I have never found anything to touch this as a waterproof of dressing; the gelatinous oil seems to effectually stop every pore in the leather. There is another advantage for those who are natty in such matters--the boots will soon take as good (common blacking) polish—so much so that a man may, if he likes, waterproof his ordinary walking-boots for bad weather without spoiling their appearance. With a common walking-boot of ordinary thickness apply the oil over the sole. Shooting, I wear boots so treated, over thick woolen socks, from eight to twelve hours a day, for more, without feeling the slightest inconvenience in any way; but they have the chilly feel inseparable from all boots that are oiled in that way.

Rust in Wheat.

From the Mechanical World.

Rust is one of the most formidable enemies the grain farmer has to contend with in wet and muggy seasons. Warmth and moisture favor its developmnt. In seasons alike in their heat, rainfall and humidity, the rust is not equally damaging. It breaks out in what appears a capricious manner. A drenching rain is sometimes followed by less rust than that which appears after a slight shower of even a heavy dew. There are antecedent conditions which largely determine the degree of liability to rust. The microscopic spores of the fungus known as rust float about in the air awaiting favorable opportunities for development, and when they meet circumstances of the proper kind they multiply with astonishing rapidly. During moist, hot weather, the sap vessels of the plants become ruptured and fungoid germs attach themselves readily. If the plants, some scientists think, are healthy and vigorous, they resist the attempt of the parasite to establish itself, much as healthy animals refuse to become the abode of parasites which thrive on their weaker fellows. Anything, therefore, which weakens the vitality of the wheat plant renders it liable to become the prey of rust, Exhaustion of food elements in the soil, the presence about the roots of sour, stagnant water, sowing for late in the fall for proper development to resist the winter, are among common and easily preventible causes, hard winters and cold, backward springs, which prevent the healthy development of the wheat plant, are among the most prominent—next, of course, to warmth and moisture. These conditions have existed this year, as they did in 1876, when the damage from rust was widespread and very serious. Fortunately, midge and weevil were not among the pests of last summer, as they were in that unfortunate season. "What cannot be cured must be endured," but the causes which can be reached should not be suffered to exist. Good farming in the broadest sense of the term, which includes proper selection of lands for different crops, proper preparation of the soil and proper culture, is the best preventative of serious damage from rust.

Australian Sheep.

An Australian paper says: A lamb dropped at Woorvoma, province of Victoria, in April, and shorn on the 12th of September, gave 6 pounds of very fine wool, belly trimmings not included. His girth behind the shoulders was 39 1-2 inches; he measured 43 3-4 inches from the top of the head behind the horns to the butt of the tail. He pulled the scale down at 100 pounds. The lambs are all extremely fat and heavy. These sheep were from Rambouillett's, imported before Louis Phillippe fled from the throne of France. Fresh blood from the same flock was introduced in the time of Napoleon III. The rams in this flock have always clipped heavily. At 2 years old, 19 1-2 pounds and 18 1-2 pounds were the weights of two fleeces. At 3 years old, the former gave 9 pounds of clean washed wool. For eight years the two sheep clipped annually from the first-named weights down to 17 pounds and 18 1-2 pounds. The sheep have always to get their living on the station; no hand-feeding is resorted to at any time.

Female Tenacity of Life.

From the Toronto Globe.

It appears from the gathered statistics of the world that women have a greater tenacity of life than men. Nature worships the female in all its varieties. Among insects the male perishes at a relatively earlier period. In plants the seminate blossoms die earliest and are produced on the weaker limbs. Female quadrupeds have more endurance than males. In the human race, despite the intellectual and physical strength of the man, the woman endures longest and will bear pain to which the strongest man succumbs. Zymotic diseases are more fatal to males, and more male children die than females. Deverga asserts that the proportion, dying suddenly is about 10 women to 780 men; 1,080 men in the United States in 1870 committed suicide, to 285 women. Intemperance, apoplexy, gout, hydrocephalus, affections of the heart and liver, scrofula paralysis, are far more fatal to males than females. Pulmonary consumption, on the other hand, is more deadly to the latter. Females in cities are more prone to consumption than in the country. All old countries not disturbed by emigration have a great majority of females in the population. In royal families the statistics show more daughters than sons. The Hebrew woman is exceptionally long lived; the colored man is exceptionally short lived. The married state is favorable to the prolongation of life among women. Dr. Hough proclaims that there are from 2 to 6 per cent. more males born than females in the living population. From which statistics we conclude that all women ought to marry, and that men are likely to become so scarce they can not be sufficiently prized by the other sex.

Another Use for Glycerine.

Dr. Soper in the Lancet, recommends the use of a mixture of equal parts of glycerine and castor oil, slightly favored with oil of almonds or lemon, as an agreeable substitute for castor oil. He states that of this mixture a teaspoonful is an effective dose, and in cases of chronic constipation, hemmorrhoids and anaemia, it has proved most useful. Half-teaspoonful doses have also been found useful in the early stages of bronchitis, in which it seems to promote exudation from the bronchial tubes and is certainly expectorant. By first pouring the glycerine into a mortor, and adding the castor oil very gradually, triturating thoroughly meanwhile, a perfectly homogeneous jelly-like emulsion is the result.

Colors in Dress.

Nothing is so economical as handsome black, in spite of its first cost, since it may be turned and returned and made over and over again so long as it holds together, and Mrs. Grundy's sharp eyes may fail to recognize it after each transformation. On the other hand, a colored dress in any positive shade becomes marked after it has been worn two or three times, and however carefully combined or converted into a new costume, is sure to be "shadowed" throughout its existence. Black however unless worn as mourning, is appropriate only for matrons and ladies who have passed the first blush. White, especially diaphanous white, is universally becoming when softened by lace and trimmed with bows and rosettes in colored ribbon, in the pretty fashion now popular. Pale blue is becoming to blondes and brunettes with clear complexion, since it has a tendency to darken the shadows. Pale pink and bright pink suit olive complexions and hair of dark, reddish brown tint. Yellow has a tendency to make the skin look fair; many reds will lend it a positively greenish hue; mauve gives it a yellow tint, and light green can be worn only by women with a perfect complexion. Indeed, the only way to tell whether a color is becoming is to hold a breadth of it about the head and neck or if this is not practicable, throw it about the shoulders close to the face.

Cheap at $30 a Yard.

From the New York Post.

The present season is certainly remarkable for the splendor and elegance of its fabrics and costumes. The rage for new and intense effects and combinations seems to have reached its height and robes of this description appear in greater contrast than ever beside the many toilets of pure white, now also in such vogue. The wealth of the Orient and the vivid coloring of the tropics are to be found in the tapestried, brocaded and embossed silks, satins and plushes that glitter with a network of beads, which closely simulate gems in their brilliancy. This prodigality of collor and combination, while it gives great scope for magnificence in dress, also gives great chance for excessive bad taste, thus necessitating the exercise of the most delicate judgment and a sure artistic eye for harmony, as well as for appropriateness and good effect.

Among the many regal fabrics now exhibited by a celebrated Broadway house is a magnificent bridal satin of ivory white, brocaded with white lilies and rosebuds, the stamens and pistils formed of cut crystals and pearls. A second pattern shows a ground of silver satin brocaded with crimson carnations, and another, of amber satin, is embossed with scarlet roses and foliage. Lastly is a pale almond satin brocaded with white anemones, blush roses and forget-me-nots. All the above-mentioned fabrics are considered low in price at the rate of thirty dollars a yard.

Habit of Thinking Aloud.

The late R. T. Daniel, Attorney-General of Virginia, was particularly absent minded, and had a habit of thinking aloud. Once, it is related, the present Senator Riddleberger was making a speech in the Legislature, of which he was then a member, when Daniel strolled in, and, during a momentary pause, remarked, unconsciously aloud, that Riddleberger was "the blankedest fool he ever saw." The House roared, Riddleberger finished his speech with difficulty, but Daniel had no idea of what he had done. Soon after he was elected Attorney-General, and Riddleberger came to him, shook hands, congratulated him warmly, and said he had worked for him as hard as any man in the State, "although," he added, "you said one day when I was speaking in the Legislature that I was the biggest fool you ever saw." "Why—why—why Mr. Riddleberger—my dear sir!" exclaimed the astonished Daniel, "you have been misinformed!" "No I haven't," said the other, "for I heard you say it myself. Now, what have you to say?" "My dear Mr. Riddleberger," said Daniel, wringing his hand cordially, "I shall have to say—good morning!"

CROOKSTON, MINNESOTA.

More than 4,500 bills, mostly of a private nature have been introduced into the house. Less than 200 have been acted on by committees and reported to the house. The fate of a vast majority can be easily guessed. They will go to the tomb, unwept, unhonored and unsung. The shame of so much buncombe business rests upon representatives and their gullible constituents.

The terrible floods now devastating the river valleys below, are attributed in a great measure to cutting down the forests adjacent to the river banks. There is no difference of opinion on this point. Had a reasonable area of forests been allowed to remain all the snow of a winter would not have been melted by a few rainy or sunny days and precipitated into a common reservoir insufficient to retain it within its banks.

The value of imports of silk goods in 1883 was $32,305,236, of which $18,140,227 was during the last half of the year under the new tariff, against $19,811,162 during the last half of 1882 under the old tariff. This decrease indicates that this branch of manufacture has not been seriously impeded by the change of duties, though the general condition of markets and the demands of employes have caused much depression. For the year the decrease in imports compared with 1882 was $6,328,798.

Stanley's complete success and De Brazza's correspondingly complete failure on the Congo, should teach the so-called explorers of effete Europe to keep out of the way of such Americans as Henry M. Stanley. The man who found Livingstone and crossed the darkest part of the dark Continent is chock full of genuine Yankee grit and push, and the attempt to defeat his plans by sending an Italian adventurer like De Brazza to Africa with a few French soldiers was absurd from the beginning.

The discordance among professional musicians and even of church choirs, has become proverbial, but it is evident that the class ironically styled "enlightened educators," is frequently subject to the same unpleasant conditions. Instances might easily be recalled where educators are not exemplars of good manners, or even of common honesty, if what they say of one another can be credited. The latest exhibition of the sort is now passing before the good people of the capital city of Minnesota, where the school board is in a state of demoralization on account of alleged, cliques, rings, and mutual criminations, involving trickery if not actual dishonesty, in the management of the common schools. The groaning tax-payers are disgusted with the revelation of so much that is reprehensible in the conduct of some of those in whom they had confided this important branch of the public service, and what is going on in St. Paul has a counterpart in many other parts of the country.

The discovery of the skeletons of twenty-three men and a number of horses in the vicinity of Ellendale, Dak., has given rise to a deal of conjecture, some of it so wild, and all of it so diverse, that the identity of the remains cannot yet be considered as satisfactorily settled. An investigation has however, been ordered by Gen. Terry, which promises much and is very likely to result in developing the facts in the case. As soon as the season will admit Capt. C. E. Bennett, Seventeenth infantry, to whom the matter has been referred, will go to the place with a party from Fort Sisseton, Dak., and make a careful examination of the remains and the surroundings, since it is more than probable that those who have witnessed the spot have overlooked some important particulars. In the meantime Capt. Bennett is diligently prosecuting the investigation in other directions. The apparent uncertainty in regard to an event that occurred only twenty years ago seems very strange, but it is only another pertinent illustration of the magnificent poem, "The Flood of Years"—which eloquently portrays the ravages of time in the burial of men and things beyond the knowledge of succeeding generations.

The report of the court of inquiry in regard to the failure of Garlington's expedition to the Arctic regions for the relief of Lieut, Greely says that Garlington made an error of judgment in not waiting longer at Pandora harbor, but the error was committed in exercise of difficult and unusual discretion for which he should not be held accountable. It is also due, Garlington to say that in the general conduct of the expedition prior to the loss of the ship he displayed zeal, energy and efficiency in successfully conducting the command through the long, perilous and laborious retreat in boats to a place of safety. As regards Gen. Hazen, the court is of the opinion that in many particulars, and in some of the gravest moments he failed in adequate comprehension of the necessities of the case and measures and rations essential to meet them. The court specifies numerous grave errors and omissions in his action and comments severely on his manner of conducting official business, but concludes that while the grave errors and omissions mentioned either directly led or largely contributed to the failure of the expedition, yet, as they, were due to lack of sound judgment and unattended by any wilful neglect, no further proceedings before a general court martial are called for.

NORTHWESTERN DAIRYMEN.

Proceedings of the Convention of the Northwestern Dairymen's Association at Mankato, Minnesota.

Synopsis of Addresses and Other Important Information for Farmers.

The Northwestern Dairymen's Association met at Mankato, Minn., on Tuesday evening. After music by the band Hon. M. J. Severence, Judge of the District Court eloquently welcomed the delegates in behalf of Mankato, extending the hospitality of the citizens. We welcomed them because they sought the application of an intelligent system embracing the observation of many states, to give a new impulse to one department of agriculture the great foundation stone that lies at the very base of all American industries and all enduring prosperity. When the generous soil of America, either from a misconception of its capacities, the true method of its development or climatic catastrophe, refuses to respond to the toil of the husbandmen, every burnished spindle must cease to hum; every hammer must rest cold on its anvil, and the white sails of commerce will mildew on the shores of every ocean.

The secretary, R. P. McGlincy made an appropriate reply, giving statistics showing the importance of the danging business. He said that a man who owns 160 acres in Minnesota has a competence, and a man who fails to succeed on this is probably a spoiled lawyer or clergyman. If you want to succeed hold on to your young stock. In order to acquire a reputation you must improve stock as horse-men do. If Minnesota farmers will feed as liberally as in Wisconsin and Illinois it will greatly improve stock. Two thousand car loads of bran and shorts were shipped from Minneapolis last year to feed Illinois cattle. Do business as carefully as thinkers and railroad men do theirs, and on as careful business principles, and you will speedily reach success.

President W. D. Hoard of Fort Atkinson, Wis., delivered his annual address.

The address begins with a reference to the growing importance of agriculture and the wondrous progress made therein of late. The demand of the times is imperative for larger-brained farmers. The necessity of employing the mind as well as the hand in agricultural operations was dwelt upon. The speaker then said; The season of 1883 has proved a fairly prosperous one for dairymen. Through the extension of the gathered cream system, very many new communities are brought into line and the milk of thousands of cows rescued from an ignominious fate. There is a large class of farmers that view all this with alarm. They have been waiting ten years for the dairy business to fail. They have been fearful all the time that the business would be overdone, forgetting that if every man in the Northwest could, by any chance, next season suddenly become a skillful dairyman, it would not add one cow to the present number. Skillful care and management would no doubt increase the profitableness of every cow brought under such an influence. It is about time the honest milk was rescued from the Pogram makers and Bascom vendors at crossroads, and for the profit of the country given a fair show for what there is in it. But there will yet remain ignorance and sloveliness enough in the land for a long time to give intelligence all the advantage it deserves. The only phase of the diary business that is over-done, and that continually, is the making of poor butter and cheese. You have seen for the last eighteen years a steady appreciation of the value of our dairy goods. There is a principle in this, gentlemen. It teaches that our only salvation lies in upholding and increasing the standard of excellence. Common farm butter has the same old look, the same smell, the same abused, banged and disheartened appearance that it had twenty years ago, and it brings about the same price. Skim cheese is the same fraud on human digestion that it ever was—has the same discouraging effect on consumption and depressing effect on price. It points the same old moral that it ever did. "What God hath joined together let no man put asunder." The makers of fine goods need have no fears of the future.

PRODUCTION FOR 1883.

It is a curious and instructive fact as shown by the last census, that the ratio of increase in cows is considerably less than that of population. This may account in a measure for the fact that the demand for dairy products has been for a number of years greater than the supply. The same fact affords also a good guarantee of the future stability of business, providing that bogus compounds are not allowed to usurp the place of the honest product of the cow. Left to a natural condition of things the dairyman need have no fears of the lack of a remunerative market in the future. He should remember, however, that if he allows himself to be driven from the field, either through his supineness, or lack of conformity to the market demand for excellence, he does not deserve any better fate. In 1880 the State of Minnesota contained 275,545 cows. Her increase for the ten years previous had been at the rate of 12 1-10 per cent annually. Measured by the same rate of increase the state would have in 1883 375,567 cows. Allowing that the product of each cow was worth $35, the gross product would reach the sum of $13,144,845. Iowa contained in 1880 854,187 cows. Her annual percentage of increase for the previous decade had been 13 1-10 per cent. This ratio would give the State in 1883 1,189,883 cows, whose earnings at $35 each would reach the sum of $41,645,870. Illinois contained in 1880 865,913 cows. The annual percentage of increase had been only 3 1-2 per cent. Applying this ratio she would have in 1883 956,833 cows, whose average earnings would amount to $32,489,155. Wisconsin contained in 1880 478,370 cows. Her annual percentage of increase had been 5 1-3 per cent, which ratio applied for 1883 would give her 557,310. At $35 each their earnings would represent $19,505,850. The gross earnings of all the cows of these four northwestern states for 1883, reaches the enormous sum of $107,885,720. By this it can readily be seen, gentlemen, that the interest you represent has reached a magnitude that calls for the very wisest administration. The time has come when so great an interest should receive all the aid that special education can give. Futher, it should be fostered and protected by the legislation of these states.

MISTAKES.

A general survey of the question discloses not only much that encourages us, but also very many mistakes. It seems to be a very difficult task to reach a large proportion of the milk producers of the northwest and get them to adopt the standard ideas of the day in dairying. They are not dairymen; they have but little real pride in the business, and what is worse, they will expend neither money nor time to learn better. Not one in a hundred of the patrons of the cheese factories and creameries of the Northwest ever attend a dairy convention. But very few of them read such papers as devote especial attention to this subject. They do not seem to care whether they succeed well or ill at the business. The speaker then contrasted the methods employed by intelligent dairymen and those of the unthinking mass. A very serious mistake was the lack of co-operation. After a tribute to C. C. Fairlamb, the founder of the gathered cream system, Mr. Hoard closed with thanks to the press for its publications regarding the dairymen.

COMMITTEES.

President Hoard appointed the following committees:

Butter and Cheese—Hiram Smith, Sheboygan Falls, Wis.; H. W. Hurtz, Elgin, Ill.; F. Mower, Cedar Rapids, Iowa.

Nominations—D. W. Curtis, Ft. Atkinson, Wis.; J. B. Vosbury, Richmond, Ill.; P. G. Fruman, Independence, Iowa; E. C. Huntington Windom, Minn.; R. H. Rose, Mankato.

Resolutions—C. F. Dexter, Chicago, Ill.; C. W. Thompson, Wells, Minn. J. G. Lombard, Chicago, Ill.; R. C. Judson, Farmington, Minn.; C. R. Beach, Whitewater, Wis.

Ways and Means—A. P. McKinstry, Winnebago City, Minn.; Lovejoy Johnson, Stillman Valley, Ill.; W. S. Green, Millford, Wisconsin.

Dairy and Farm Implements—A. D. Le Land, Sheboygan Falls, Wis.; L. M. Potter, Elo Claire Ill.; G. D. Holmes, Owatonna, Minn.

T. C. Curtis of Rocky Run, Wis., read a paper on the subject of "Butter Making by private dairymen."

His farm, twelve years ago, was very much depleted and the speaker found himself at that time, in debt by raising wheat. He begun to raise sheep, but did not make the business a success, and finally was driven into dairying. At first made fair butter and could take premiums at home fairs, but when he sent his butter to Milwaukee it did not command the highest price. The chairman of this convention was the individual whose valuable advice enabled him to become a good butter maker and a successful dairyman. Mr. Curtis spoke of the difference between creamery and diary butter. The first is the product of a factory with all necessary improvements and appliances, and to this fact he atributed its superiority. In making butter one trouble lies in the conceit of the makers, good cows well milked, well fed and kindly cared for. Pure air and proper temperature absolute are necessities for excellent butter. Impurities absorbed in private farm dwellings are injurious. The milk should be cooled to sixty degrees in five hours. Milk heats quickly and cools slowly; 12 gals. milk cooled from 90 to 60, lose one pint. One hundred pounds of milk contains one pound more sugar than butter. Sweet cream makes a good butter, but does not keep. To give the graining quality a small degree of acidity is necessary; too much destroys it. Solidity is important in packing and neatness is one of the best points to be attained. The speaker recommended the use of Higgin's salt. Could see no advantage in salting in brine. Uses a little more than a pound of salt to seventeen pounds of butter. He (Curtis) takes about one hour and a half to churn, work and pack his butter. Recommended coloring butter. In cans set in water milk must be skimmed sweet and acidity obtained afterward. Places water around cans to height of milk. Churns at sixty-two degrees. He feeds his cows well, salts stock three times a week; fences off bad water, giving cows only such water as he would drink himself. During drouth use corn fodder, pumpkins, etc., never allowing the cows to lose flesh. Does not try to obtain all there is in a cow in one year; keeps his cows longer; keeps his cows up to regular quantity, because when cows once slacken up one cannot bring them back to original quantity.

H. E. Hoard of Montevideo, Minn., in a paper on skim milk farming, compared wheat and dairy farming. Showed the cost of raising wheat in upper Mississippi valley, and stated that in his county about 600,000 bushels of wheat are raised annually, bringing in Chicago about $500,000. It costs $150,000 to send this wheat to market, leaving about $100 net proceeds to each farmer. The speaker felt sure the result would be much better if farmers would turn their attention to dairying instead.

C. F. Dexter of Chicago followed with a paper on "Organizations for the Promotion of Special Objects" with special reference to organizations of the dairy interest.

Vice President P. A. McKinstry of Winnebago City, Minn., read a paper entitled "Shortage in the Creamery Gathering System."

By the term of shortage, as used by creamery men, we mean that in buying a certain quality of cream, which has been supposed to make a given quantity of butter, and it fails to do so, we say we are short on butter; or, in other words, we bought cream enough to make so many pounds of butter, according to the standard rules, and it failed to make it. He said the shortage reported in Iowa for the year 1883 was 4 per cent. on all the butter manufactured by the cream-gathering creameries running on the gauge, where I have no doubt that it was fully as much for 1883 in Minnesota. What is the remedy for the creamey man? I know of none that can be adopted and deal justly with each patron except the test churn plan. He concluded by saying that unless the manufacturing shortage shall be done away, cream-buying is a failure in Minnesota.

W. B. Straight did not wish the idea to go abroad that the shrinkage was due to difference in cream instead of the amount of milk turned into cream. Mr. Johnson of Illinois asked for instructions how to secure uniform skimming. Mr. McKinstry answered:

By having milk skimmed daily by same person and at same hour of day. He collected cream for his creamery every second or third day. Used a preservative, which the gatherer adds as he procures the cream, which holds back the cream from mature acidity. Ripening cream thickens as it grows sour; sweet cream is thin. Butter from small churnings does not granulate as well or as rapidly as that from larger churnings. I open my cream jars and stir cream frequently and leave exposed to air, for the reason that the cream takes up oxygen, which affords a finer flavor to the butter.

President Hoard stated that:

One of the secrets of "cream shortage" was the effect of the churn on cream. In the season of succulent food the churn receives its due proportion of butter. By feeding roots, ensilage and succulent food the churn will do its work with profit. Farmers who allow their hay to ripen too much and grow woody are denying to the churn the proper returns it should receive.

President Hoard then read a prize essay read by D. W. Carter, at the Wisconsin Dairymen's association. The essay was replete with valuable suggestions.

H. B. Gurler, of De Kalb, Ill., then read a paper on the cow, the calf, and the pig. These animals naturally go together in dairying. Have raised them in order of their importance in the new parts of the West. In Illinois I would read cow, pig, calf. The cow, if properly cared for is the most profitable animal on the farm. When I commenced dairying my cows would average only 150 pounds of butter annually. I began to test milk. I learned that the cow which produced forty pounds of milk per day, produced one pound of butter per day, that the cow giving 18 pounds per day produced more butter than the cow that gave 40 pounds of milk per day. I sold off unprofitable cows and found I had some that would not pay for the feed they consumed; others would pay $60 after paying for their feed. Changed from summer to winter dairying and increased butter yield in a few years from 150 to 160 pounds per cow, and the profit above price of feed was an increase from $15 to $45 per cow, an increase of 200 per cent. For the year ending Jan. 1, 1880, I received $2.23 worth of milk for every dollar's worth of feed consumed by my cows. We have one patron that we paid $87.09 per cow last year. One patron kept an accurate account of feed consumed by his dairy of fourteen cows last month. For grain feed, $42; hay, $21.70. Total cost feed, 63.70. Cows produced 7,700 pounds milk, worth $1.50 per 100 pounds or $113.50, leaving a surplus after paying feed of $51.80. Have checked abortion by the use of bone meal fed to the cows with their salt. I feed one-fourth bone meal, three-fourths salt. The calf is an important animal with the dairyman, but there is little profit in growing a steer.

In the pig is little profit. I give the following comparison of my most successful pig feeding with that of my most successful calf-feeding:

Feb. 22, 1881, two grade Durham calves about five months old, weighed 732 pounds; March 1st they weighed 767 pounds, a gain of 35 pounds in seven days; gain each per day, 2 1-2 pounds. They were fed as follows:

280 lbs skim milk at 25c	$ 70
44 lbs corn meal	25
70 lbs of hay at $10 per ton	35
Total feed expense	$1 30

Cost per pound, 3 7-10 cents, to compare with the following:

June 8, 1878, 8 pigs weighed 327 pounds: June 21, 423 pounds, a gain in thirteen days of 96 pounds. They were fed 439 pounds of skim milk and 217 pounds of corn. Crediting the milk with 6 1-2 pounds per 100 would make 27 1-2 pounds increase from 60 pounds of shelled corn. Figuring the milk at 25 cents per 100 pounds and the corn at 30 cents per bushel (market price at time) the pork cost 2.27-100 cents per pound.

In the evening it is estimated that sixteen hundred people were in the opera house. The exercises consisted of an excellent musical programme, and a sprightly, well written, practical paper by Mrs. Curries embodying her experience in butter making. But my own experience is to furnish a good warm stable, warm their milk, feed a little bran and shorts or oats every day, and have a rack and keep it filled with your sweetest and best hay, keep their stables clean, and they will have nothing to do but grow.

With regard to feeding milch cows, I consider mixed bran and shorts, corn, pumpkins, and plenty of good, sweet hay, as the best class of food, together with plenty of pure water; and don't let your cattle stand around in the yard, with their backs humped up like a rainbow, during snow storms and blizzards.

On Thursday the 14th the first business was the reading of a paper by Hon. Hiram Smith of Sheboygan Falls, Wis. He said Prof. E. Stewart, the best authority on cattle feeding, gives as a standard ration for milch cows, daily, 24 pounds of dry organic substance, and this ration should consist of 2 1-3 pounds albuminoids, 12 1-3 pounds of carbonates and 40-100 fat. Thirty pounds of hay will produce the dry substance, but will be deficient in albuminoids and fat; 30 pounds of hay at $10 per ton costs 15 cents; a much better ration, consisting of corn fodder 10 pounds, hay 5 pounds, bran 5 pounds, malt sprouts 5 pounds, corn meal 3 pounds, and oil meal 2 pounds, will cost no more than the hay, and is worth more as a food, and three times more for manureal value. Modern dairymen are learning that cows coming into milk in the fall or early winter bring in a much larger revenue than summer dairying.

The reading of this paper was followed by a spirited and vigorous discussion of the subject and a rapid fire of questions and replies.

The second paper was that of O. C. Grigg of Camden, Minn., on the subject Minnesota as a dairy state. This is emphatically a grass-growing state. Wild grass grows abundantly. It was the home of the buffalo long before the white men settled here. The writer thought Minnesota an oat state, and thought oats the best crop farmers could raise. He mentioned the erroneous idea that costly barns are required for the proper care of stock in winter. There is no necessity for an expensive building—a stable with good roof, and sides well battened on inside, and well banked, will keep stock comfortably through our winters. When the thermometer showed the temperature to be 29 deg. below zero outside, the speaker found the temperature inside his stable 34 deg. above. Light and ventilation are important requisites. Windows should be on the south and east. Ventilators should be placed in the roof, so foul air may escape. Plenty of good water should be within convenient distance of the barn. Another objection is that the feeding season in this state is too long. This is a mistake. Make the cattle debtors for abundant feed and creditors for plenty of good butter and cheese furnished in return. The key to success is good feeding. A Minnesota winter gives a wonderful appetite and a faculty to convert food into milk.

The committee appointed by Judge Blanchard to report an organization of a butter board of trade, to be located at Mankato, to be entitled the Butter Board of Southwestern Minnesota was announced to be composed as follows; Col. Clark W. Thompson, Faribault county, Minn.; Z. B. Clark, Chippewa county, Minn.; C. E. Marvin, Olmsted county, Minn.; E. C. Huntington, Cottonwood, county, Minn.; J. C. Noe, Blue Earth county, Minn. Recess.

C. R. Beach followed with a paper on the subject "Is Dairying a Better Business for a Farmer of a New Country Than Grain Raising?" The speaker began by contrasting the farmers of Wisconsin under the wheat raising system with that they now enjoy in the business of dairying. The dairying is a more certain business than grain growing. One objection to grain growing is that profits are nearly, if not entirely, consumed in shipping and placing it in the market. The labor in dairying is light, and extends through the entire year, in utter contrast to grain growing.

J. G. Lombard of Chicago followed with a paper on "Legislative Control of Railroads," which presented in a forcible manner the railroad side of the question.

"The Progress of Dairying in Wisconsin" was the subject of a paper read by D. W. Curtis, of Fort Atkinson, Wis. The state is peculiarly adapted to dairying, abounding in tame grasses, good pasturage, pure spring water and blessed with a favorable climate for making butter and cheese in all seasons of the year, yet less than a quarter of a century ago the popular verdict was that neither good butter nor cheese could be made in the west, there had been serious objections made to quoting Wisconsin butter and cheese as, "Western," but as Western butter and cheese was now quoted a cent or two above the regular market quotations the term "Western" did not seem objectionable. The old log houses and barns have given way to comfortable farm houses and commodious barns. The farms are in a high state of cultivation, and their bank account bespeaks prosperity in every home.

J. A. Smith of Cedarsburg, Wis., read a paper on the subject "Cheese Production, One of the Essential Factors in General Dairying."

Mr. Smith gave facts and figures to show that the making of cheese, showing the industry to be as profitable as the making of butter.

The committee of awards reported. The $18 prize to be awarded to O. C. Gregg, Marshall, Minn. The $15 prize was awarded to Messrs. Gillis & Finnan, Bingham Lake. The prize of a valuable shawl, offered by McConnell & Co., for the best package of butter, was awarded to F D. Holmes. The pair of fine kid shoes, offered by Messrs. Quebel Bros. for the best package of dairy butter, were given to A. Arnold of Mankato. The Higgins cup, won last year by William Fowler of Newport, Minn., goes this year to J. H. Harris of Elgin, Ill.

About six hundred guests attended the elegant banquet that evening. The tables were sumptuously loaded, and the guests promptly and abundantly served. Toasts were offered in profusion and witty, wise or humorous speeches were made by Hon. J. A. Willard, Rev. Mr. Pollock, Edward Searing, Col. R. P. McGlincy, Hon. H. M. Burchard, Col. Clark Thompson, W. D. Hoard of Wis., Judge Wells, Preston, Gen. Baker, and a host of others.

On Friday, the association listened to the report of the secretary, Col. R. P. McGlincy.

An interesting and practical paper on the subject of "Feeding for Profit in Minnesota," was then read by H. C. Howard of Lake Crystal. He said: "Plenty of grass is the foundation of successful dairying," is a motto which every dairyman should remember and constantly bear in mind. I have not seen any better soil raising grass than is to be found in Southern Minnesota and Northern Iowa. No other part of the country can raise grass and hay with as little expense as this section. While our wild grasses, make good, sweet butter, (and very good hay if cut early,) they are not the best for dairy purposes, owing to the fact that they begin to dry up about the 1st of August, and after that time they are a poor milk-producing food compared with blue grass, timothy and clover. We can grow these tame grasses to perfection here, and dairymen should turn under their prairie sod pasture and get tame grasses growing at the earliest possible moment to insure greater profits.

With a good clover and timothy pasture your cows will make as much butter in October and November as they will make in June on wild grass. Cows relish a variety of food: a change of diet sharpens their appetite. A feed of roots given to a cow will make her relish her grain ration better, and every dairyman should raise a good supply of them. Mangel-wurzels are splendid food for milch cows and calves. You can grow mongel-wurzels at a cost of only one cent for twenty pounds: five cents for 100 pounds; $1 per ton. What other food of equal value can be purchased for five times that amount?

The report of Treasurer Oatman showed: Receipts for past year, $1,016,50; expenses, $945,56; balance on hand, $70.84.

The committee on nominations reported:

For president, W. D. Hoard; for secretary, R. P. McGlincy; for treasurer, H. B. Gurley. Vice Presidents—Minnesota; H. M. Blanchard, Marshall; E. C. Huntington, Windom; C. E. Marvin, Rochester; A. P. McKinstry, Winnebago City, Wisconsin; Hon. H. Smith, Sheboygan Falls; C. R. Beach, Whitewater; John Whellep, Summer; S. G. Flack, Elkhorn; Iowa—Col. R. M. Littler, Davenport; Hon. J. S. Sampson, Storm Lake; S. W. Johnson, Oscaloosa; C. A. Huston, Cedar Rapids, Illinois—C. C. Brull, Rock Falls; L. J. Johnson, Stillman Valley; J. J. White, Aurora; E. S. Oatman, Dundee, Nebraska—W. S. Whitman, Valley; S. W. Dye, Nemahee City, Dakota—N. K. Hubbard, Fargo; F. M. Felton, Huron.

The committee on ways and means recommend an appropriation of $500 to publish the annual report; $100 to President Hoard, and $150 to Secretary McGlincy for labor; also that creamery and dairymen make special efforts to buy and read the report. The price of the forthcoming report was fixed at 30 cents per copy, or four for $1.

Gen. J. H. Baker thought the Durham supplied all the qualifications needed in stock. Reports of English stock men confirm this testimony.

The afternoon session opened with the reading of a paper on "The Breed of Cattle Best Adapted to the Wants of Northwestern Dairymen," by S. M. Emery, Lake City, Minn., giving most decided preference to the Holsteins or Dutch Fresians.

W. B. Cromwell of Storm Lake, Iowa, read a paper, which was discussed at length, on "Mistakes Under the Cream Gathering System" Mr. Anderson, a prominent New York commission man, stated that he found the Storm Lake butter good grain, clean and free from impurities on the trier. The fact that the trier comes out greasy and not clean on the back shows butter to be overworked. Mr. Cromwell did not think second working necessary on account of buttermilk, but to add solidity. Buttermilk can be gotten out on first working. Think the majority of creameries work but once.

"Butter, and Butterine" is the title of a paper read by Joseph Lampson of Storm Lake, Iowa. He said the imitation of creamery butter is so very perfect that even experts are puzzled in deciding as to what is butter and what is butterine, when samples are placed before them. In my judgment three things ought to be done by us with a view of meeting and combating not only this evil, but all others of a kindred nature.

First—All who are interested in farming and farm industries, whether directly engaged in the dairy business or not, ought to unite in demanding that a national law be enacted covering food of adulterations, somewhat similar to the laws of France and England on the same subject.

Second—The dairymen of the west must learn that nothing but the best creamery butter will be able to dislodge butterine, even were it sold on its merits and under its proper name by the retail grocers. The associated dairy or creamery system must be fostered, encouraged and perpetuated. Further than this, we must furnish this butter at a fair low price.

Third—The people must be taught what good butter is by having plenty of it offered to them at a fair price. In addition to this a great work of public education must be done through the newspapers and journals of our land, bearing upon this bread and butter question.

After discussions and reading of papers on matters not directly before the convention, President Hoard thanked the convention for the continued confidence shown by his re-election as president. He congratulated the association on the splendid success of the convention, and announced the convention adjourned sine die.

The full proceedings, as will be seen above, will be published in a pamphlet, with all the papers read, and those especially interested will do well to obtain copies, though the foregoing report contains the meat and substance of the whole.

Two more army officers have been dismissed the service for duplicatnig the pay accounts—Lieutenants N. L. Clark, of the Twenty-third infantry, and J. F. Cummings, of the Third cavalry. This makes seven officers who have met with similar disgrace for the same offense.

Confirmations: Allen Francis, consul, Port Stanly and St. Thomas, Ontario; Phillip Caroll, consul, Palermo; Wilber Goodspeed, United States marshal, northern district Ohio; Peter French, New York, collector customs, district Alaska; postmaster, W. C. McNee, Montezuma, Iowa.

A gentleman claims to have stood at the Western Union office at the capitol for one hour the other day, and during that time thirty-three congressmen sent messages using thirty-two dead-head franks and one paying the usual tariff. That looks encouraging for a political telegraph bill.

The action of the Harvard graduates resident in the District of Columbia, in not inviting Prof. Greener, a colored professor of their alma mater, to their banquet the other evening, has stirred up a good deal of talk. Secretary Lincoln, himself a Havard alumnus, considered it an inexcusable insult and refused to attend.

The attorney general has decided that sugars which remained in bonded warehouses at the time the new tariff went into effect, but which had been in bonded warehouses beyond three years from the date of importation, are not entitled under the new tariff act to a reduction of duty, nor are they entitled to the privileges of exportation.

The text of the new commercial convention between Spain and the United States is identical with that made public Jan. 5; but clauses relating to the abrogation of tonnage duties on vessels sailing from America to Cuba, and Porto Rico, and the abolition of the special duty on live fish imported into Cuba are to be submitted to the cortes.

The house committee on postoffices and post roads agreed to report favorably the bill amending the section of the revised statutes authorizing the postmaster general to stop the delivery of registered mail or money orders to fraudulent lottery companies, by striking out the word "fraudulent," thus including all lottery companies in its provisions.

A bill has passed the senate committee on postoffices and post roads to make all public highways post routes. It will, if it becomes a law, remove the necessity of passing the special acts creating post routes, and will simplify the establishment of postoffices. New mail service can then be granted by the application to the second assistant postmaster general without the aid of congress.

Chairman Cobb, of the house public lands committee, says that, though there may be some delay, the committee will report in favor of the forfeiture of all the Northern Pacific land grant, except the 746,390 acres already patented. In the case of the Atlantic and Pacific, having the largest land grant, the forfeiture of the entire grant, with the exception of 959,206 acres, patented before June 30, 1883, will be recommended.

John C. New, who has been trying for so long to resign the assistant secretaryship of the treasury department, is finally gratified, the president having on Friday, the 15th, accepted the resignation that was tendered nearly a month ago. Mr. New had a hard time trying to convince the president that he is in earnest in wanting to get out of an arduous and perplexing office. Mr. New is in Indiana, whither he went a couple of weeks ago.

A letter has been written to Secretary Folger by Congressman Washburn stating that the public building at St. Paul is so badly overcrowded and public business so greatly embarrassed that relief must be obtained by transferring some offices from the St. Paul building to the proposed structure in Minneapolis, and requesting secretary Folger to order such changes in the plans for the Minneapolis building as will accommodate these transfers of departments.

The Proteus court of inquiry has made its report, and finds that while Lieut. Garlington made an error of judgment in not waiting longer at Pandora harbor, the surrounding circumstances rendered the error an excusable one. It also awards him just praise for his zeal and energy, both before the loss of the ship and also during the retreat. Gen. Hazen, however, does not get off so easily, as the court goes on to specify numerous grave errors and ommissions in his action.

Inspector Gordon, of the interior department, has been sent to Minnesota to investigate the condition of the Mille Lacs Indians. The department has been considering the propriety of removing the Indians to White Earth, but they protest against this, and their representative, Mr. Robinson, was before the commissioner of Indian affairs in their interests. Gov. Hubbard, Senator McMillan and, Capt. Blakely also called at the department on the 15th in behalf of the Indians. It is proposed to distribute a part of this annuity among them in money, and a part in provisions and other necessaries of life; but the Mille Lacs, as other Indians, prefer all in money, and plenty of it.

The president some time ago sent to the senate the name of William A. Hobbs as receiver of public moneys at Taylor's Falls, Minn. Gen. Washburn shortly after requested the president to change the nomination, and asked that Peter H. Stolberg be nominated in his place. The change does not reflect any discredit upon Mr. Hobbs, but, it is understood, it was made owing to the near relationship of Mr. Hobbs to the register at that place. A day or two ago an inquiry was made regarding the confirmation of Mr. Stolberg, when it was discovered that two nominations for the place were pending, the name of Mr. Hobbs not having been withdrawn. Mr. Washburn immediately directed the attention of the president to the fact, and the name of Mr. Stolburg will undoubtedly soon be confirmed.

The secretary of the interior has decided to recommend that the nomination of Mitchell to be register at Duluth be withdrawn, and has called upon Hon. Knute Nelson to name some one for appointment in his place. Mr. Nelson has recommended the appointment of E. G. Swanstrom of Duluth. It was very doubtful whether the nomination of Mitchell could be confirmed. It is said that the charges of fraud in connection with the pre-emption law were not seriously regarded as an objection as they did not appear to be sustained; but the secretary of the interior says that his attention had been called to a series of articles published by Mitchell some years ago, attacking Christianity and using the most violent and indecent language. These articles were shown to senators and they declared Mitchell's nomination ought not to be confirmed.

There died at Washington, on the 14th, a colored woman which had obtained a national reputation owing to her connection as housekeeper with the late Thaddeus Stevens of Pennsylvania. Lydia Smith was the name of the woman, who was in her sixty-ninth year, and a stroke of apoplexy was the immediate cause of death. In 1846 Mrs. Smith left Harrisburg, Pa., and went to Lancaster to keep house for Mr. Stevens. When the "great commoner," two years later, was elected to congress, he brought Mrs. Smith to Washington to look after his affairs. Mr. Stevens lived in a house on B street adjoining the present Congressional or Sanderson's hotel. Up to the date of Mr. Stevens' death Mrs. Smith directed the affairs of his establishment and ministered to his wants. She was remembered in his will with a bequest of $5,000 in cash, certain property at Lancaster, and several houses here. Subsequently Mrs. Smith opened a boarding house on Newspaper row opposite Willard's.

Rail and River Notes.

Judge Beach, in the New York court of common pleas, decides that a railroad company is not liable for injuries to a deadhead passenger.

A company has been organized at Des Moines with a capital of $1,000,000 to construct a second railway bridge over the Mississippi from Rock Island to Davenport.

The Green Bay, Winona & St. Paul has ordered a 20 per cent. reduction of wages on all employes in the locomotive department of the road. The reduction takes effect the 1st proximo.

The official report of the Omaha for 1883 shows gross earnings of $2,094,050,92, and taxcific, with headquarters at Portland, arrived in St. Paul. He will go west with Mr. Muir and party.

On the 18th inst. the party of commissioners appointed by the Winona, Alma & North Wisconsin railway will start out from East Dubuque to condemn land for right of way, where the owners have refused to sell on reasonable terms. All the land heretofore purchased has been promptly paid for at satisfactory prices.

A mixed train on the Southern Central dropped into the Seneca river at Weedsport. Floods had weakened the bridge. Burr Ridgeway, engineer; John Straight, fireman, and Timothy K. Danahay, brakeman, were in the cab of the engine at the time and were drowned. The engine went under water. The passenger car remained on the track.

The Criminal Calendar.

Portland, Oreg., is infested by an organized band of river pirates.

Mrs. Uhler, whose brother killed her paramour, Haverstick, at New York, is dead.

Leander Anderson, charged with selling liquor to Indians, was fined $25 by Judge Nelson in the United States district court.

Skilled cracksmen stole from the office of Dr. C. Brainerd of Cleveland the finest numismatic collection in Ohio, embracing every coin issued by the United States except seven pieces.

The coroner's, jury in the shooting of gamblers at Hot Springs, Ark., returned a verdict that John Flynn came to his death at the hands of Doran, the two Pruitts, Alison Howell, Lucius Fanning and Tom Dale.

A teamster named Robert Robertson entered the room of Anna Ford, in St. Louis, and commenced moving her furniture. Mrs. Ford, with the aid of a colored man, ejected Robertson. The latter got a knife and re-entered the house, when the woman shot him twice, mortally wounding him.

The jury in the case of David C. Keller, pilot of the steamer Sciota, sunk by collision with the John Lomas July 4, 1882, at Wing's Junction, the 13th returned a verdict in the United States court at Parkersburg, W. Va., of guilty of voluntary manslaughter, with a recommend to mercy. Fifty-four lives were lost by this famous collision.

A desperate fight occurred about twenty miles from Matamoras, Mexico, between customs officers and guards and a gang of smugglers, in which Maj. Palacias and one of his men were badly wounded, two smugglers killed, and several wounded. The rest of the smugglers fled, leaving behind $8,000 in dry goods, and a number of horses and mules.

The Miles City Journal gives particulars of the absconding of Sam Camp, leaving a large number of creditors to mourn, among them the laborers employed by him on the Tongue river ditch, and Miles & Strevell, $128.30; Leighton, Jordan & Co., $461,54; J. W. Watson, $56.50; A. W. Sleeper, $383,97, making a total of $1,002.31 for merchandise.

Hon. James B. Davis, member of the Texas legislature, in a wild frenzy supposed to have been caused by excessive drink, escaped from his room at the Junction hotel, Whitesboro, Tex., late Monday night, the 11th, with nothing on his person but undergarments. Every exertion to find him was without avail till Tuesday morning, when his body was discovered stiff in death, lying face down in the road a mile south of town.

Jasper Shearen was shot and killed by his cousin and brother-in-law, George W. Rawley, in Boyle county, Ky. The killing originated in a family feud, and was done in self-defense. Rawley's father killed Shearin's brother a year ago, and recently met. An affray ensued in which Shearin was killed. The Rawley family for the past thirty years have figured in bloody affairs, in which no less than ten men have been killed.

Recently the associated press sent out a report from Sioux City that the man hanged by a vigilants committee at Bassett was not Kid Wade, the leader of the Nebraska horse thieves. On the 14th the coroner's jury at Long Pine, the county seat, declared it was Kid Wade. The remains of the Kid were also identified by the sheriff and others. The reign of terror continues in the Niobrara country. Several prominent citizens have been implicated by the death confession of the Kid and have been notified by the vigilant committe to clear their skirts immediately or leave the country.

Sheriff Carter of Cherry county, Neb., was recently notified by the vigilance committee to leave the country immediately. The vigilantes claim he is in collusion with the Nebraska horse thieves beyond a doubt. Sheriff Carter announces a fixed determination to stay, denies the charges made against him and has sworn in a posse of thirty men for his protection. The sheriff and his men are all armed to the teeth awaiting the hostilities. The leader of the vigilantes has posted up a notice that no man living can escape their vengeance, least of all Sheriff Carter. Further developments are anxiously awaited.

Jim Blaine's book will be issued simultaneously in English, French and German. William D. Eaton, formerly a Chicago journalist, is supervising the translations of the work, a force of ten translators having been placed at his command. Mr. Blaine gives Mr. Eaton $5,000 for this work and a royalty of 15 cents upon each volume sold in Germany and France.

Mrs. Mary Miller, who wants to run her own steamboat, is described as a trim little woman, whom nobody would credit with years enough to be the mother, as she is, of four children, two of whom are nearly grown. She came of a "steamboating family," and she thinks she has as much right to command a vessel as her father, who is a captain, or her late husband, also a captain.

Justice and Mrs. Field gave a dinner party, the 13th. inst. to celebrate the birthday anniversary of David Dudley Field, who was seventy-nine years old that day. There were 20 covers and the table was decorated with roses, the central ornaments being English pheasants. The president took in Mrs. Field and sat on her right, the chief justice sitting on her left. Justice Field sat at the opposite side of the table, with Senator Edmunds on his right and Speaker Carlisle on his left. David Dudley Field sat on the right of the president, the secretary of state sitting opposite. The other guests were Justice Harlan, Justice Blatchford, Senator Gibson, Representative Randall, Rev. Henry Field, Cyrus W. Field, Representatives Hewitt, Tucker and Dorsheimer, Justice Gray, Mrs. Dudley Field, Jr., and Senator Bayard.

Drift of the Great Flood.

There are 3220 people of Wheeling, Viar., left desolate by the flood.

Gen. Lander post, G. A. R., of Lynn, Mass. has decided to forego its anniversary exercises and send the money, about $400, to the flood sufferers.

Three-fourths of Ironton, O., is under water, including the entire business portion. The water is seven feet higher than in 1883. Though it has fallen considerably, it is still above any known high water mark. Soup houses open, but inadequate. Thousands are homeless and penniless. Frame houses have been swept from their foundations and brick buildings crumbled into the waters. At Hanging Rock but four houses are above water. Caryville has but two houses above the flood. The bottom lands are devastated. Starvation stares thousands in the face.

The waters have receded about six feet in the Kanawha at Point Pleasant, leaving many houses upturned and twisted from their foundations.

Losses on property at Lawrenceburg Ind., can be safely placed at not less than $400,000. Nine inches more would have flooded the floor of the highest located house in the city. Wind and waves last night not only caused more loss, but terrified the inmates of flooded houses. One row of houses, five in number, was swept away on the 15th. Four squares are now a total wreck.

In Boston, $3,500 has been subscribed in aid of sufferers, and $3,000 forwarded. The wool merchants' sent $1,200 worth of blankets.

About 5,000 people are out of homes, at Louisville, Ky., but the local relief committee have things well in hand, and there is not much suffering. Inch by inch the water has come up at Jeffersonville, Ind. till nearly every street has disappeared. If the water continues to rise at the present rate, there will not be a dry spot. The sights are most distressing. Houses have caved in, and hundreds of people are huddled together in the same building. Many remain in the second stories, shivering and suffering from dampness and cold, and in many cases, hunger.

The secretary of war has telegraphed the mayors of a number of towns in West Virginia, Indiana and Ohio, authorizing the purchase of supplies for immediate use and directing them to make returns, properly authenticated, to the military officers. He estimates the cost of their expenditures and the cost of expeditions es of $60,476.13, being an an increase over 1882 of $338,757.44 in gross earnings and $8,831.21 in taxes.

A. D. Charlton, recently appointed general western passenger agent of the Northern Pa to the sufferers from Pittsburg and Louisville will aggregate $180,000.

The Association of the Red Cross at St. Louis as raised nearly $1,000 for the benefit of the sufferers. Gen. W. T. Sherman subscribed $100 to the fund. Ivanhoe commandery, Knights Templar, sent $100 to Hanselmann commandery, Cincinnati.

The towns of Northern Ohio are generously contributing money and supplies for the distressed people of the Ohio Valley. Children of the Mansfield schools contributed their Valentine money.

The subscriptions at Cleveland for sufferers exceed $10,000. Mrs. Garfield contributes $100. The committee is still forwarding supplies to various points.

Japps, Ill., is inundated, water covering the tops of houses.

The rise of the river at Cincinnati was over 73 feet.

At Catlettsburg, Ky., many streets are blocked with houses that have floated from their foundations.

The gross receipts of the matinee in Chicago were given by the Mapleson company, including Patti and Gerster, for the benefit of the Ohio flood sufferers and were over $5,000.

After a hard fight against the rising water, Shawneetown, Ill., has succumbed, and the streets are now five to fifteen feet under water.

Harmar, Ohio, is flooded, and the people destitute. Hundreds of buildings have been washed away, and people are camping on the hillsides. Harmar asks for relief.

The latest telegrams say that the Ohio is slowly subsiding and people are hopeful that the worst is past.

Twin Valley, Norman Co.
Feb. 18th, 1884.

Ed. Polk County Journal.

Dear Sir:—Enclosed you will find my subscription up till May 1st 1884, and please allow me to say a few words expressive of my commendation of the course pursued by the Journal in the interest of the farmers on the wheat question. I can not express my feelings as fluently as many but I feel truly grateful to the Journal and all other papers that have stood up for the poor farmer in his endeavor to obtain justice in this matter of wheat selling as I know that the press is a powerful engine for good if rightly used. I think that the Farmers' Alliance that you advocate is a move in the right direction and deserves the hearty support of every farmer in the Northwest as the dark clouds now covering the horizon will sooner or later burst and engulph our beloved land in ruin if something is not done to prevent. The political economy of our country is getting more rotten than Rome, in her palmiest days could boast but that is not what I was going to say though the connection is so close that the miss-step was easy and natural for had we a "government of the people, by the people and for the people" that CARED A SNAP FOR THE INTEREST of the people such a state of things as have existed this fall could never exist for such laws as would render a monopoly impossible would ere this have been enacted and we should have now been enjoying the benefits of an open wheat market. Therefore the necessity for some such an organization as the Farmers' Alliance, in which all can unite, the farmer, the poor laboring classes and all business men whose interests are identical with ours as we can not expect reform in the body politic until we, who are in the majority, largely unite our forces and our efforts and demand a change, demand such wise and just laws as are in accordance with the principles of a free government, such laws as will assure equal rights to all—in this case the rights of freemen to market our own produce wherever and whenever it is to our best advantage without being forced to submit to the decrees of a soulless monopoly as we are at present obliged to do. What earthly good do our Senators and Representatives do at the present time? The railroad companies are given land sufficient to build their roads then are allowed to charge exhorbitant, oppressive rates and the people must stand the racket, must pay the fiddler for the (doubtful) blessing of having a railroad. The Manitoba road has a grant ten miles wide each side of its track, (equivalent to a solid block ten miles wide) which, if they sell it at $5.00 on an average would give them $30,000 per mile for every mile of their road while the actual cost of construction could not have exceeded $10,000 per mile at the very outside figures. Would not this be just grounds for the government to assume to regulate their freight rates, at least to see that they do not become so exhorbitant as to be a means of distressing its citizens? Has not the government clearly the right to protect even the humblest of its citizens in his honest endeavors to acquire a modest independence? But what are the true facts? The Government has given this road a magnificent land grant and then allows it to charge just such freights as it has a mind to and also to enter into such combination with the millers who grind our grain as allows the millers to pay the farmers just the bare cost of raising the wheat (and in many cases less) which renders him unable to pay for his land alone to say nothing about providing his family with the barest necessities of life. For instance, supposing I purchase 160 acres of the company at $5 per acre; that amounts to $800. We will say (for the sake of argument and not because it is so by any means) that I raise 20 bushels of wheat upon it, I have 3,200 bushels then. The railroad charges me 15 cents to carry that wheat to St. Paul, when the price should not exceed 10 cents at the outside. The company further allows the elevator companies to add from 5 to 7 cents per bushel (besides their regular just profits in handling) thus my wheat costs me, unjustly at least ten cents per bushel more than it ought to under a fair system. On that crop of 3,200 bushels I have to pay at least ten cents over charge, $320, OR $160 OVER THE WHOLE COST OF THE FARM IN THREE YEARS TIME! Is it not a hardship where a man has to pay for his farm every three years and even more than that, when if the Government was as just to its citizens as it is generous to its railroads all that excessive charges should go to the one who produced it, to the farmer to whom it rightly belongs? Leaving out the excessive charges on freights on machinery, on produce, on everything the farmer must have I think it can plainly be seen where the shoe pinches the farmer under the present system and why the Government should come to his relief, and why, if the Government will not attend to it he should attend to it for himself, should unite and formulate some plan looking to a relief and that right speedily, or we could, if we chose improved our natural water way to Lake Superior which would effectually check the rapacity of our railroad and free us from its clutches at once. We have the power within us if intelligently applied to make circumstances to our advantage, to compel the buyer to pay us what our wheat is fairly worth. That is all we want and it is certainly a [illegible] reasonable desire, and I can not but think that our farmers, by their apathetic submission to these gross wrongs are, in part, themselves to blame. What I have said is liable to apply to every year that we remain subject to the same system and does not show the actual loss we have sustained this year, by reason of the so-called "frozen wheat!" Some poor farmers have been obliged to sell No. 1 Hard wheat at from 30 to 50 cents per bushel under the shallow pretense that it was "frozen!" Thus forcing him to accept from 25 to 45 cents per bushel LESS THAN THE ACTUAL COST of raising and marketing his wheat. Excuses are easy under the present system and we have no assurance that another fall if not "frozen wheat" some other excuse as effective will be found for these millers are very fertile in imagination where an excuse is needed for forcing down the price of wheat. We must have relief and the sooner we all understand that and unite to that end the sooner it will come. We can not raise wheat under the present system and we must unite and force a change or else we must pack up and get out of this country as quickly as possible. Hoping, Mr. Editor that I have not wearied your readers on this topic of such vast interest to themselves as well as myself I am yours respectfully.

P. S. O.

Manitoba farmers seems to be in a worse pickle than the farmers of Dakota and Minnesota on the wheat question. A delegation of farmers have been sent to Ottowa to ask the government for relief but it seems that the government gave them the cold shoulder whereat the Manitoba Free Press, among other things remarks: "It is to be borne, that the development of this country shall depend entirely upon the caprice of the East? We are prevented from building roads to connect us with the United States. We are to be prevented from gaining an outlet to the markets of the Old World. In other words, Manitoba is to be enclosed like a cow in a pasture, and milked for the benefit of Eastern Canada. We are to be compelled to purchase from them at their own prices. They are to take from us what they want, giving, as what they please for it. The one pathway to and from the preserve in which they have decided on penning us, is to be held possession of by them. This is a truly "jug-handled" arrangement.

So far we have tolerated the southern monopoly, though there are indications that even that will not much longer be endured. That we should be refused permission to undertake the opening up of a route which would make the other restrictions to which we are subjected of comparatively little importance; that a scheme which would revolutionize the trade of half a continent, and do more for the Dominion than all the transcontinental railways it can build, should be baulked by a narrow-minded clique at Ottawa, manipulated in the interests of designing speculators, is more than can patiently be borne. Let the Government be warned in time that it will not be borne. The Northwest as one man has resolved on the speedy opening up of the Hudson's Bay Route; and what it wants it will have or will know the reason why.

It is idle to tell us that an amount will be placed in the estimates of an exploration of the Bay and Strait. We have not asked for that. We are fully satisfied of the navigability of these waters. The purpose of making any such appropriation is simply delay. If an expedition were sent under the management of the Government at the present time, no one would have the least confidence in its report, inasmuch as it is evidently the desire of the Government, or of those by whom it is controlled, to throw every possible obstacle in the way of the opening up of the route. The proposal to send such an expedition, therefore, instead of being looked on as a favor, will be regarded as the most offensive manner of refusing to grant our request for an extension of the Provincial bonds.

The opening up of the Hudson's Bay Route we are determined to effect. The Government need not hope to turn us aside from a purpose so closely concerning our material well being by any subterfuge. Our demand for the enlargement of our territory is a simple one. Let it be complied with and the road will be built. Let it be denied and the Government will bitterly regret it in the near future."

The Farmer's Agitation.

Minneapolis Evening Journal: The remark is made in certain quarters that the agitation in regard to wheat grades has done or may do a great deal of harm to the Red River country and to Minnesota and Dakota farmers. We do not think so. All agitation is healthful in the long run. Discussion brings out the truth and suggests new or better plans. If the farmers are suffering injustice at the hands of the millers and the railroad, the millers and railroads want to know it, and apply a remedy, for the prosperity of the farmers is the foundation of their own prosperity. It would be suicidal for the millers to pursue a policy that would starve the farmers out of the Red River Valley, or drive them to largely abandon wheat raising for other industries. The temporary advantage of increased profits for a season or two would not compensate them for the permanent loss of a growing scarcity of wheat for milling purposes. The only way, that we can conceive of, that the farmers' complaints can do harm to the Red River country, is to frighten immigrants away from it by giving them the impression that the chances for making a competency, or even a livelihood there, are small. But a let-up in immigration for a year or two is not to be feared by the farmers, however much it might hurt the feelings of the railroad men. The less wheat that is raised in proportion to the demand, the more independent will be the position occupied by the farmers. And this leads us to the consideration of a valuable pointer for the farmers, which is not original with us, but which is very obvious to all persons in any degree familiar with the situation in the new Northwest. The farmers have placed [illegible] of the millers and the railroads and all sorts of middle men by their exclusive devotion to wheat raising. A traveler who recently stopped at a farm house in Dakota was surprised to find this family using a poor article of store butter at a high price, and still more surprised to find the settlers generally dependent on the stores for butter, eggs, flour, meats and nearly all kinds of vegetables, of the latter using the canned article all the year through instead of raising any for themselves. All their energies were concentrated upon wheat raising to the exclusion of everything else. This course lays them under doubled tribute to the railroads, first, for the freight on their wheat product to market, and second, for the freight on everything they consume which is brought in from other sections. Now if these farmers would diversify their industry, if each family would keep a few cows and hens, hogs, sheep and horses, and cultivate a generous vegetable garden, they would grow every year more independent of both the railroads and the millers, and in a few years would be in a much better position to dictate favorable terms. If the agitation will open their eyes to the wisdom of such a course, it will do much good. In the meantime, Manager Manvel, of the Manitoba road, expresses a disposition to accommodate them to the extent of his ability in the matter of freight rates and in granting permission for the erection of independent elevators along the Manitoba side tracks. But the farmers must remember that as well as other railroads is owned by an aggregation of stockholders who are looking for dividends. They will not permit manager Manvel to pursue a course that will materially cut down their dividends. The same is true not only of the Minneapolis but all other flouring mills. Their stockholders will dictate to the operators of the mills that policy that will bring the largest dividends. They are too wise to go to the extent of "killing the goose that lays the golden eggs;" they will not seek to absolutely impoverish the farmers and drive them out of the business of wheat raising—but like all business men they will seek to do business on a basis that will pay them. They are not buying wheat and grinding it for fun. In order to make their demands effective the farmers should appear not as suppliants, but as men standing on an equal footing of vantage. To do this they must reform their methods. Exclusive devotion to wheat raising, while it may enrich some men in favorable years, will never make the farmers of Northern Minnesota and Dakota as a class independent. But a gradual introduction of other crops, and of stock-raising, will.

Stock Raising.

Fargo Republican.

Every farmer's dooryard in North Dakota should present that cheerful picture which we have so often seen portrayed in engravings, paintings and chromos; the happy family of domestic animals; the cattle, poultry of all kinds, swine, horses, sheep, etc., mingled in harmonious contentment. The picture is significant because it throws into bold relief the thought that the problem of the owner's living expenses is solved and the broad acres lying out yonder, beyond the stacks and barns, are operated for profit. This practical picture the farmers should strive to create; and now, as we stand on the threshold of the new year's work it is well that the importance of this stock question should be duly weighed and some provisions and plans made to make this year, at least a commencement. There is hardly a farmer so poor but that he can make a start of some kind and in a few years he would grow into the ownership of one of those "happy families" and hardly realize where its members all came from. He will not be obliged then to carry his wheat to the elevator until he can sell it outright, at a satisfactory figure; he will always have something to carry to market to exchange for such articles as he may need, and when his crop is harvested it will all be his, every kernel of it and he can sell it when he chooses with no one to question his motives. This is the condition the farmers can all get into if they will. It shouldn't be hurried beyond ones capacities or resource for then it becomes a burden instead of a help, but a slow, sure, safe progress will bring about the desired result as sure as the sun makes its daily visit.

Of Interest to Farmers.

Hudson Star and Times.

Emil Mellcke of Windom has three acres of artichokes, which will yield about 3,300 bushels. Last year, from one-half bushel of seed, he gathered thirty-five bushels, and then turned the hogs into the patch. Thirty hogs ran there three weeks, and on the same ground now is a good crop. This will grow for years without further cultivation. In the spring the hogs can be turned in when the frost is out and remain till June 1st. Then they must remain out till early frost, when they can go back and get their own feed till the ground freezes, and need no other feed. There is no other harvesting of this crop, and once planted the farmer has hog feed for years. Mr. M. has fifty hogs which he fattened on artichokes last fall. Last fall they were in his clover field and all did well without further care. These are the Red Brazilian artichokes, and his experiments with the Jerusalem was not satisfactory.

We have received a specimen copy A. M. Purdy's Seed, Plant, and Tree Catalogue. It is a beauty. The colored plates of his new seedling Raspberry [illegible] of all strawberry, the Jumbo, are very fine indeed and should be seen by every lover of fruits. The information given on growing strawberries, raspberries, blackberries, grapes, &c., is very valuable, while his prices for plants, trees &c., are as low as any reliable grower or dealer. The Catalogue, or a specimen copy of his valuable monthly paper the Fruit Recorder, can be seen at our office, or by dropping a postal to A. M. Purdy, Palmyra, N. Y., a copy of either or both will be sent to you free.

Purdy's 64-page Small Fruit Instructor will tell you all about growing small fruits for home use or market. Send him a 25 cent postal note or postage stamps and he will send you a copy post paid. He also sends free to all applicants his beautiful and instructive catalogue of fruit trees, plants, vines, seeds, &c., (a copy of which may be seen at our office,) as also a specimen copy of Purdy's Fruit Recorder and Cottage Gardener—a 20 page monthly devoted exclusively to fruits, flowers and vegetables. It speaks for itself.

Address,

A. M. Purdy, Palmyra N. Y.,

A great Nation with one Language.

Until ours, there never has been a great nation with one language, without dialects. In England, hardly larger than the State of New York, a Yorkshireman can hardly talk with a man from Cornwall, while in our country five thousand miles change not the sound of a word. We owe it to Noah Webster. His dictionaries and his sixty millions of spelling books have educated four generations. Only two men have stood on the New World whose fame is so sure to last—Columbus, its discoverer, and Washington, its saviour. Webster is, and will be its great teacher; and these three make our trinity of fame. Of his great Dictionary—said to be, in the quantity of matter it contains, the largest volume published,—aptly has it been suggested that "Every farmer should give his sons two or three square rods of ground, well prepared, with the avails of which they may buy it. Every mechanic should put a receiving box in some conspicuous place in the house, to catch stray pennies for the like purpose," thus furnishing the whole family with an ever-present and reliable schoolmaster.

Best Book for Everybody.—The new illustrated edition of Webster's Dictionary, containing three thousand engravings, is the best book for everybody that the press has produced in the present century, and should be regarded as indispensable to the well-regulated home, reading-room, library, and place of business.—Golden Era.

A PAPER FOR THE TIMES.

The Chicago Daily News is the pioneer of cheap journalism in the West. It was founded Dec. 20, 1875, as an evening paper with editions at noon, 3 and 5 o'clock. A complete newspaper,—complete in the one essential feature of American journalism, i. e., presenting all the news,—sold on the street at any price less than the conventional nickel, was an innovation in western journalism, and, like all new enterprises, the "cheap paper" had to contend with long-established custom and even prejudice before securing the recognition it sought and deserved. At the end of the first year, 1876, it had achieved a daily sale ranging from 8,000 to 10,000 copies. From this time forward its progress was beyond all precedent in American journalism. In 1877 its average daily circulation was 22,037 copies; in 1878, 33,314 copies; in 1879, 45,194 copies; in 1880, 54,801 copies. On the morning of March 21, 1881, the Chicago Morning News made its first appearance. In September following, the sixth month of its publication, its circulation amounted to 490,019 copies, or a daily average of 18,846 copies,—a circulation never before attained by any daily paper in the United States, within a corresponding time.

The Chicago Daily News, therefore, as now published, consists of MORNING, NOON, and EVENING ISSUES, known respectively as the Morning News, Noon News, and Evening News. The average combined circulation of the three issues of the Daily News now exceeds 90,000 copies each day. To appreciate the exceptional extent of this vast circulation it is only necessary to state that it is over three times the circulation of any other daily paper in Chicago or the West, while its circulation in the city of Chicago is GREATER than ALL other Chicago daily papers COMBINED. Being an independent paper, the organ of no party, sect, or class, it is the one universally read Chicago paper. The subscription price of the Daily News, either MORNING or EVENING issue, is $6.00 per year, or $3.00 for four months, postage included.

On July 2, 1878, the Daily News purchased the Chicago Evening Post, consolidated its daily issue with the Daily News, and continued its weekly issue under the name of the Chicago Weekly News. The Weekly News under its present name and management is therefore less than five years old, though as a consecutive weekly publication it is now in its twentieth year. The Chicago Weekly News takes a corresponding field among weekly newspapers to that occupied by the Daily News among dailies. It gives the news of the world in condensed yet complete form. Its Chicago market quotations are especially complete and trustworthy. That the Chicago Weekly News has been correct in its judgment of the requirements of a large class of readers of the weekly press is best evidenced by the extent of its circulation, which aggregated in the month immediately preceding the date of this writing, 202,058 copies, or a weekly average of 50,518 copies. The subscription price of the Weekly News is but SEVENTY-FIVE CENTS per year, postage included.

The phenomenal success of the Chicago News in both its DAILY and WEEKLY ISSUES has been achieved by observing that fundamental principle of offering the best article of its kind in the market at the lowest cost to the purchaser. The Chicago News is cheap only in price. The character of its news service is unsurpassed. It is a member of the Western Associated Press, and in addition to the unrivalled news service furnished by this Association, it enjoys the exceptional advantage of its own special telegraphic wire from Chicago to Washington and New York on the East, and to Milwaukee and St. Paul on the North. Giving all the news through reportorial and telegraphic facilities unsurpassed by those of any other Chicago paper, it commends itself to all classes in the community, to rich and poor alike, in that it offers an absolutely complete record of the news of the day in concise form, without the needless verbiage and amplification which render so many metropolitan journals "a weariness to the flesh," while its price brings it within the reach of all classes. It is a paper for the times.

Nasby's Paper

THE Toledo Weekly Blade.

CIRCULATION 115,000.

This vast circulation is because the Blade is a paper for the whole country. It is not thrown together, but every line of it is edited by competent hands. It is a complete epitome of the news of the week, and whoever reads the Blade carefully, needs nothing else to be well informed as to what the world is doing. Editorially the Blade has made a proud record. It has an opinion on everything that effects the people of the country, and it expresses it boldly, fearlessly and forcibly. As good as the Blade has been in the past years, we shall make it better than ever in the year to come.

Among the features for the coming year will be the regular "Nasby Letters," two serials by Nasby, entitled "Nasby in Exile," and "Nasby in the South," a serial story by Ernest Warren, entitled "Court and Camp;" a serial by John McElroy, author of Andersonville, "Reminiscences of an Army Mule;" a serial written for the Blade by an Austrian Nobleman; besides our regular departments, "Household," "Answers to correspondents" "Camp Fire," etc., etc. We publish all the news and latest corrected markets.

Politically the Blade will continue an exponent of true Republicanism, believing that the best interests of the country demand the continuance of its control in the hands of the party that represents the highest and most advanced ideas.

THE RUM POWER.

The Blade will fight this monster iniquity with all the power it possesses and in every way possible. The Blade holds the liquor traffic to be a greater curse than slavery, and a thousand times more dangerous to the country.

We ask the co-operation of every well-wisher of the Republic that our work may be effective. We ask every Republican in the United States to assist in extending the circulation of the Blade, especially among those of the Republican party who believe as we do in the necessity of Pulverizing the Rum Power. We want the Blade in as many families as possible this winter, that it may be read before the excitement of a political campaign, giving it time for its truths to take root in the minds of its readers.

THE WEEKLY BLADE, $1.00 a year, postpaid to everybody. Those preferring may receive the Blade Three Months by remitting 30 cents, or clubs of three months trial subscribers, of not less than four, 25 cents each.

OUR GREAT ART OFFER.

A $10.00 Steel Engraving for $1. Write us for a specimen copy of the Weekly Blade, which will give full particulars of this the greatest offer ever made by any publisher. We send specimen copies of the Blade free to any address. We want as many addresses as possible to send Specimen Copies to. Write a postal card asking for a Specimen for yourself, and send us the names of all your neighbors. We want to send out a half-million Specimen Copies within the next month. Don't be modest as to the number.

FARMERS' GRIEVANCES.

Douglas County News.

The farmers of the Red River Valley have been holding a convention in St. Paul the past week for the purpose of finding a remedy if possible for what they claim is an extortion perpetrated on them by the Pillsbury & Hulbert Elevator Co., and the Millers' Association of Minneapolis. The convention seems to be very harmonious in most matters. There is undoubtedly some grounds for complaint and if it is as they say there is a large unbleached American in the fuel. But whether they can remedy that evil by passing resolutions looks somewhat doubtful. The remedy lays with the farmer individually; until he gives up the idea that he cannot raise anything but wheat and gives his attention to the diverifying of his crops and raising more beef and pork he will have to succumb to the inevitable law of supply and demand as regards wheat. All the resolutions and kicking on earth will not help that; he will put himself in the power of just such syndicates, for as the demand is so will the price be. That there may be some agents of those companies that are not above suspicion there is no doubt, but they are found in all classes of business and although the principal is bound by the acts of his agents it is impossible to completely regulate that part.

The question as to the erection of more elevators by outside parties lessening the difficulty is also doubtful. Take in our own place for instance. Private parties put up an elevator here Their money was in it and they were entitled to a fair interest on their investment, and the farmers were willing to assist them as long as they paid the same price as P. & H., but let P. & H., raise the price a few cents and their interest in these private parties suddenly ceased and was transferred to P. & H. If the erection of such elevators are permitted than they are at the mercy of irresponsible persons, and will only be jumping out of the fryingpan into the fire. The only remedy we see is for the farmer to raise something else besides wheat that is marketable at any time of the year and not be compelled to let go his wheat at any price that may be given.

Bro. Gilpin, of the News, does not seem to grasp the situation fully or he would know that the remedy does not lie wholly in the hands of the farmer yet his suggestions in relation to stock-raising are timely and wise. The price of wheat to-day in this section is but 79 cents for the best and wheat in the east is low to-day but wheat here is within three cents of being as high as at any time during the past winter and fall with the exception of a few days in early fall when it was 86, and Bro. Gilpin well knows that wheat in the east has been very much higher than it is now. He can see in that fact that "the law of supply and demand" does not regulate the price of our wheat and, Bro. Gilpin that is just what causes the "kicking." Please to take notice Bro. G. that that same kicking, has however done a great deal of good for to-day the price of wheat in this market is nearer eastern prices than it has been before this past fall and winter and all because of the "kicking." The Millers' Association have practically controlled the wheat market here paying for it, not what the law of supply and demand dictated but just what they were a mind to. Moreover, they have taken our No 1 Hard wheat and mixed it up with soft wheat and wheats of inferior grades thereby making on our wheat the amount that our No. 1 Hard wheat is worth more than the soft wheats and we have had no chance to sell the same wheat we have raised, in eastern markets but must submit to the extortion as there has been practically but one buyer in our market. The elevator system in vogue gives the millers this absolute control of our wheat and all we have been obliged to do so far is simply to raise the best sample we can and take it to the nearest elevator and take whatever the millers were a mind to offer for it. Mr. Pillsbury publicly boasted that the brand known as "Pillsbury's best" was worth 25 cents more per barrel in New York city than any other flour in the market. But Mr. Pillsbury failed to say that it was the No. 1 Hard wheat of this valley, which he had bought at prices less than soft wheat will bring in a competing market that made that difference in the price of "Pillsbury's best" over all other brands. Now if Mr. "Pillsbury's best" had to find an eastern market in the very same way that the Millers' Association have forced our No. 1 Hard to find an eastern market, i. e. if it had to pass through a set of elevators and (be subjected to mixing up with flour of soft wheat, of flour of off grade wheat, flour of all sorts of wheat of inferior qualities, with shorts and whatever the elevator men choose to mix with it is it reasonable to suppose that "Pillsbury's best" would reach the eastern markets in its virgin purity and readily command 25 cents per barrel more than all other flour? How would Mr. Pillsbury and the millers enjoy a dose of their own medicine? Don't you suppose, Bro. G. that there would be a long and lusty kick? And yet you seem to wonder that the farmers kick when the millers are enabled through the system in vogue to handle our wheat in this way and secure to themselves all of the profits that by right belong to the farmers. Do you wonder that we "kick" when we have not received the cost price of raising our wheat, especially when "the law of supply and demand" without manipulation, would have given us a fair and living profit? As the farmers are perfectly powerless under the system the only remedy which lay with him was to "kick" and continue to "kick" vigorously until somebody took notice of him and asked him "whats the matter?" This he has done and the Manitoba company asked him "what's the matter?" So it came about that a committee was sent down to state the farmers' grievances and ask for releif, and this is what Bro. G. calls the convention, and Bro. G. will in time see that the committee has done a grand good work. It is not our intention in this article to show wherein the smaller elevators and wheat houses will benefit us, suffice it to say that they will do it, the reduction in freights will help some and now we have only to look to the matter of grading to have our prospects for a fair wheat market in pretty tolerable good shape, and all this has come of the "kicking" which Bro. G thinks so utterly useless. Now, after we have accomplished so much for wheat prospects Bro. G's advice as to stock will dove-tail right in and work in harmony, and every farmer should endeavor to work into a perfect system of diversified husbandry just as quick as possible. He should as soon as practicable get a start in stock and grow into it as fast as possible. That there is more money in it than in wheat at its very best is eminently true and if both be combined a man is sure of something. He has not placed all of his eggs in one basket and is not gone all to smash if the basket falls or the bottom tumbles out of it. It is a fact that the past year has demonstrated that we raised too much wheat this fall and if we stop to consider what we should have raised had not the drouth cut off the crop from one-third to one-half we can easily imagine how we could be even worse off than we are. Because we have fixed things so that we are now tolerably sure of getting what our wheat will bring in the eastern market, minus transportation charges is by no means any reason why we should pin our faith to wheat alone. The good book says "man can not live by bread alone," and it seems as if that would apply equally true to wheat. One-half of his farm devoted to stock and the other to grain would make the farmer far more independent than he can ever hope to be by putting it all in wheat even though he was sure of getting far more for his wheat than he has ever realized in the Red River Valley. We are satisfied that there is good sound common sense in this idea and that the sooner the system is generally adopted the sooner will we be treading the highway of prosperity.

Northfield Journal: The farmers of the Northwest are still agitated over the question of the injustices they have been subjected to by the elevator companies. A delegation of farmers along the line of the Manitoba road have visited President Hill and talked the matter over with him and the committee appeared to be well satisfied with his explanation of the situation and to look at it in a different way from what they did when they arrived in St. Paul The farmers of Clay County held a meeting last Saturday and after a lengthy discussion adopted a preamble and resolutions setting forth their wrongs and specifying their charges against the railroad companies, and calling on the farmers of the State to hold county conventions and appoint three delegates to meet in St. Paul on the 18th, 19th and 20th days of March, to take action in regard to the matter. The farmers of Polk County also held a similar meeting on the 2d inst., and passed resolutions having the same object in view as the Clay County farmers. This is a matter in which the farmers need to act with unanimity and caution; while they should not magnify their grievances. We hope they will continue the agitation until justice to all shall prevail.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF TEN.

A Systematic and Comprehensive Review of the Work done by the Committee.

The Mission, Interviews with Manitoba Railroad Officials and other Investigations.

The Results Achieved Summarized and Recommendations made on Behalf of the Northwest.

Grand Forks Herald.

At a full meeting of the Committee of Ten, Friday evening, February 15th 1884, at the office of Maj. Hamiton, chairman of the committee the following report, embrasing the incorporation and approval of the sub-committee reports, was unanimously adopted and ordered to be printed at the Herald office, for general distribution throughout the entire Northwest.

To the Northwestern Farmers and Merchants Association.

GENTLEMEN:—The Committee appointed by the Convention held at Grand Forks, D. T., on the 29th of January last, met on the said day and organized by electing J. G. Hamilton chairman and Geo. B. Winship the secretary of the convention, as its secretary, and agreed to visit St. Paul on the 5th day of February, 1884, and present the grievances of this section to the representatives of the St Paul, Minneapolis and Manitoba Railroad Company. Mr. Manvel manager of the Manitoba system suggested the adjournment of the meeting until the 15th ult on account of the absence of C. A. Pillsbury, the leading representative of the Pillsbury & Hulbert Elevator Company from Minneapolis, but governed by the resolutions of the Convention that appointed us, we concluded that our mission was with the Railroad Company and that no authority had been conferred upon us to present our case to other than the Railway Officials and hence decided not to await Mr. Pillsbury's return, and accordingly proceeded to S. Paul, arriving there on Friday morning the 8th day of February A. D. 1884.

Your Committee was strongly impressed with the seriousness of the duty imposed upon them and from the outset determined to investigate the matters referred to them thoroughly, to take nothing for granted and to gather from every source, information and facts of value to the committee, and the constituency they represented. The task has been no easy one and while the conclusions of the committee may disappoint some let it be borne in mind that our conclusions are based upon facts ascertained, upon premises investigated and approved and not upon supposition or imaginary belief and in submitting our findings we trust that our constituency will consider them thoughtfully, weigh them carefully and endeavor to intelligently and reasonably discuss the various subjects investigated and herein reported upon.

It will be remembered that the Grand Forks convention was the outgrowth of a universal sentiment among our people that they had been wronged and outraged in their disposition of this years crops—that there was no staple or just market for their productions, that the market was practically monopolized—that their productions were not honestly weighed and were dishonestly, in many instances, graded and it became the settled conviction that unless these abuses were rectified and such safe guards provided for the future to prevent a recurrence of the experience of this year, that our future growth and prosperity would be seriously crippled if not permanently injured.

Seeking, therefore, the remedy for these abuses, the convention formulated its wishes in a series of resolutions which conceived a remedy in an open market for the sale and purchase of our cereal products, which would be fostered if not made in a removal of the restrictions imposed by the Manitoba Railway in building elevators on its line, by reducing the minimum capacity required to at least 15,000 bushels, this supplemented with the right to ship our grain from its initial point through to any eastern market without breaking bulk or interfering with its purity, and in connection with these concessions, would be made effectual by a reduction in the tariff rates of the Manitoba Road.

On Friday the 8th day of February the committee held its first conference with Mr. Manvel representing the Manitoba Road. Messrs. Faulkner, Garnett and Larsen were requested to present in your behalf what we designated as the farmers side of the question and to cover the subjects of grading [illegible] [illegible] the question of an open market [illegible] [illegible] immigration and the necessity for [illegible] ensure the continued prosperity of [illegible] connection. To Major J. G. Hamilton [illegible] questions [illegible]. The general [illegible] resulting from the dissatisfaction of the farmers, caused by the capricious, unreasonable and often times iniquitous grading of wheat at the different elevators in our country, and in connection therewith to urge the absolute necessity of a speedy and material reduction in the freight tariff of the Manitoba Railroad.

These gentlemen stated they were dealing with actual evils, not imaginary ones, that the grievances were pressing heavily upon our people and that instead of the happy, prosperous and contented farmers of previous years, our people, smarting under wrongs for which there seemed no redress, were embittered, and surrounded with an array of discouraging circumstances, were loosing faith in the country and looking to other regions for future homes. Reasoning from these premises, coupled also with the statement strongly empasized that the railroad was our partner in these evils, that upon our prosperity depended its, that this community of interest was not severable, these gentlemen pressed home upon Mr. Manvel the necessity of the railroad co-operating with the people in changing the conditions of affairs—that instead of seemingly building up and protecting a monopoly in the purchase of wheat, it should inaugurate a system that would throw our productions open to the competition of the world.

THROUGH SHIPMENTS.

Heretofore the general impression in the Valley has been, that it was impossible for our farmers to ship grain to Milwaukee, Chicago, or Duluth without transfer, and without filtering the same through the elevators of Minneapolis or St. Paul. We found this impression to be erroneous, that at no time has the shipment of wheat to the points named without transfer been disallowed by the Manitoba road, but, on the contrary, any shipper has had the privilege of sending his grain to any of the markets before named, and that during the past season the Manitoba road carried direct to Duluth, more than three million bushels of grain, and at relatively lower rates than those charged by other roads operating in similar Territory and under More favorable climatic conditions. Why the right of through shipments has been so mysteriously concealed in the past is a question your committee is unable to answer. Perhaps an explanation is found in the fact that the owners of elevators on the line of the Manitoba railroad are largely interested in the milling industries of Minneapolis and that their best interests are subserved in monopolising the manufacture of flower from No. 1 Hard wheat indigenous to this climate alone. Proclaim now to the humblest farmer, and send it to the uttermost limit of our grand valley, you can consign your wheat to any market, or to any individual you desire, at the same rates, and upon the same conditions and that to this end every reasonable facility will be afforded you by the Manitoba Road.

ELEVATORS.

The convention further instructed your committee to advocate a reduction in the capacity of elevators, and urged the adoption of a system wherein the minimum capacity should be fixed at 15,000 bushels. This has been done. No subject was more thoroughly and exhaustively discussed than this.

Mr. Manvel stated that the road desired to meet the wishes and accommodate the necessities of its patrons, and that after mature deliberation and study they had fixed the capacity at 30,000 bushels. If they were mistaken they were ready to change and that upon the return of the president of the road, Mr. Hill, (then absent) he would lay the matter before him.

It was the intention of your committee to return to their homes on the night of the 9th, but ascertaining that Mr. Hill would reach St. Paul on the 10th Feb. concluded to await his return and present the subject of elevators and needed reforms in conducting the same, to him.

In accordance with this determination we had a conference with Mr. Hill on Monday the 11th February.

The resolutions of your convention were presented for his consideration; and the elevating system in vogue on the Manitoba Road discussed. At this time Mr. Hill elaborately explained the policy of the Manitoba Railroad towards elevators, saying substantially, it had been the paramount desire of that road to establish such a system as would promote the interests of the farmer. That immediately upon assuming the management of the Manitoba system he had notified a company which had the exclusive franchise of erecting and operating elevators upon the line, this policy had been abandoned, and that it was the intention of the company in the future to allow any responsible party or parties to build and operate elevators, at any and all stations, subject to such uniform and reasonable restructions as the necessities of the company warranted and the demands of its patrons required. He further stated that after careful research and in the light of the experience of other roads, operating in a wheat country, the company had decided that a minimum capacity of 30,000 bushels was reasonable and within the means of any responsible person desiring to purchase grain, and illustrates the potency of this position by stating that at any station on the Manitoba line a warehouse of 30,000 bushels capacity with hoisting apparatus, by horse power, with proper and requisite facilities for cleaning and handling grain, could be built for $2,000, or, if steam power desired, for [illegible] [illegible] theory of the Manitoba road in fixing the capacity at 30,000 bushels [illegible] [illegible] always satisfactory [illegible] legally [illegible] these facilities could be afforded in an elevator for less capacity. Perhaps our system has anticipated the future and is not equal to the demands of the present. Our primary object was to furnish the farmers a stable market in which at any season of the year they could sell their products. We felt that we could not afford to countenance a system which resulted in an open market for four months of the year, and a closed one the remaining months, and, animated by a desire to secure an open market at all seasons and to promote the highest interests of the producer made our minimum 30,000 bushels.

The force of this position is apparent, and it affected a radical change in the pre-conceived opinons of the members of this committee. We believe Mr. Hill is right in his position, and in the light of our investigation, and in justice to the company, feel compelled to say that the restriction of 30,000 bushels capacity is not unreasonable, and any immediate chang is unwarranted in view of the difference in cost between a 15,000 and 30,000 bushels elevator. However, Mr. Hill stated with emphasis that if the farmers and business men of this section, after investigation, and upon consideration of the whole subject, and in the light of their present and future necessities, believed that there interest would be better promoted by a reduction in the capacity of the elevators, the company was redy to meet them. If 30,000 was too large, they could have 15,000 or 10,000 or even 5,000 but he confidently believed that in six months thereafter they would come down and beg for a change: therefore, your committee is prepared to say to any community on the line of the Manitoba road that the present policy of the road is sufficently generous to meet the reasonable demands of all concerned, and on that score there is no further just cause for complaint, and we respsctfully suggest a thorough study and examination of the question of capacity of elevators before recommending for adoption a lesses capacity than the minimum now established. The committee urged upon Mr. Hill the necessity of placing similar conditions upon all elevators hereafter erected whether there capacity be 5,000 bushels or 100,0 0 bushels viz: They shall be kept open at all seasons of the year, have proper facility for cleaning grain and for sight weighing. No reasonable objection can be made to such restrictions if they applied to all equally.

Any individual farmer can build a grain house sufficiently commodious to store the productions of his farm on the side track of the road and will be afforded reasonable facilities to forward his crop to market, and in the light of this concession we believe the necessity of smaller elevators vanishes.

REDUCTION IN FREIGHTS.

Nothing is more important to the producer than a fair return for his labor. The elements which affect price are diverse, and apparent to all. Chief among the elements is that of cost of carriage. As a rule, the more remote the distance from market, the greater is the cost of carriage, and hence to us, situated so far from the primary markets, nothing is more important than tariff rates. No question has perplexed your committee more than this. We have not spared time or diligence in reaching ultimate facts, because in one respect, has there been harsher criticism and louder complaint than has been expressed in the alleged extortion of the Manitoba Road in its freight rate. It has gone without saying that no country was more oppressed by excessive rates and unjust discrimination than ours. We have conceived ourselves martyrs, ruled by an inexorable monopoly, acting without regard to our necessities, bent only upon serving its own ends, regardless of the needs of its servants. It has been the current belief of our people that the relations of the Manitoba Road, or individual officers controlling its policy were of such an intimate and confidential character that elevator monopolies were not only possible but actual, and that no man, or combination of men could in common parlance have a "fair deal" unless they "stood in" with the ruling power. After the most scrutinizing enquiry and investigation we say the suspicion is unjust. Before inquiry we believed it true. After inquiry and investigation the evidence adduced forces us to say that there are no rebates or concessions granted to corporations, partinerships, combinations or individuals doing business on the Manitoba line.

Pillsbury & Hulbert, shipping thousands of bushels of wheat to Minneapolis, are obliged to pay the same rate per bushel as the farmer who ships a single car load. Of the truthfulness of this, your committee is abundantly satisfied. At the same time, your committee urged that in view of the outcome of the present year, and the prospective development of our great valley the time had come when the Manitoba Road could reasonably and justly to its stockholders and its patrons, revise its tariff rates for wheat, coal and lumber and to establish a more liberal classification as to general merchandise. On this subject, after careful scrutiny, we find the following facts, more particularly set out in the report of the special committee appointed by your general committee, to investigate the tariff rates of the Manitoba Road and compare the same with other roads operated in our own Territory which report is annexed hereto and its finding of facts and deductions there from made part of this.

ST. PAUL, Feb. 12, 1884.

To the Red River Valley Farmers' Com-[illegible]

GENTLEMEN:—We herewith submit as full a report on freight rates as the time and circumstances will permit. [illegible] it was simply to compare rates and [illegible] compelled to go deeper into the figures [illegible] going into the different points in detail.

Situated as we are, next to the boundary line on the farthest northern railroad in the United States, with as yet only a small amount of the local traffic, this committee is of opinion after carefully and impartially considering the matter, that there are many extenuating circumstances not generally remembered when discussing the subject in regard to rates. Comparisons when made, are generally with an old and well established railroad running through a thickly settled country, its through traffic heavy, its local traffic remunerative, large and populous manufacturing or business centers at frequent intervals along its road, a close proximity to supplies and other favorable conditions, all in a line with, and, favoring a low tariff such as could not reasonably be expected from any other railroad not so conveniently situated. We have had every opportunity afforded us of making a close inspection into a number of the reports furnished by railroad companies in regard to the coust of operating, price of fuel, and other matters not generally known to the outside public. The coal bills and other accounts of the St. P. M. & M. railroad company have been examined and we find there is a difference of from 60 to 75 per cent on the cost of operating expenses in every case against that railroad in the matter of fuel and other incidentals connected with locomotive service. A comparison of one or two roads near coal mines and operated under more favorable climatic conditions, than ours, out of a number examined, will serve to illustrate:

	Ave. cost operating per mile run. Cts.	Ave. cost for fuel per mile run. Cts.
St. P. M. & M. R.	29.89	15.83
Minn., & S. L.	18.79	5.84
C. R. I. & P.	17.46	6.21
I. C.	16.14	6.55
St. P. M. & M. for Dec.	38.47	17.61

Cost of coal per ton at St. Paul to St. P. M. & M. $4.20 per ton; on engines, Illinois Central $1.90 Chicago B. & Q. $1.60.

We would have preferred to have drawn comparisons with the N. P., C. M. & St. P. and C. & N. W. but Mr. Manvel had no recent statistics from them. By an examination of the tariff it will be seen that on the question of wheat rates the one we are all most vitally interested in, we are certainly in a more favore condition than any other road. It was with some difficulty and perseverance that a wheat rate was obtained showing the charges on the C. M. & St. P.—That company adopts a system called the "milling in trust," rates by which the farmers are compelled to ship their wheat to some flouring mill along the track where it is ground into flour and reshipped on, as far as the C. M. & St. P. road can cary it. We are told all possible obstacles are thrown in the way of the farmer shipping his grain and getting it to the wheat market independent of the millers. He is in a manner compelled to submit and is in that respect in a far worse position than the Red River Valley farmer, who can always place his grain on the market independent of mills and sell his tickets to the highest purchaser.

The desire has been expressed to get past Minneapolis as a market, either to Duluth or Chicago. In order to show a comparison of rates to each place we herewith append a statement showing the cost of transportation taking a few stations only having almost exact distances from each point to Chicago.

	Cts. per bu.
Ellendale (C. M. & St. to Chicago 759 miles	27.6
Columbia (C. & N. W.) to Chicago 750 miles	22.8
Minto (St. P. M. & M.) to Chicago 760 miles	24.6
Minto (St. P. M. & M.) to Duluth	15.6

A number of other stations might also be given but the result would be the same. This proves conclusively that at present apart from Minneapolis, the market we must look to is Duluth and not Chicago there being a difference of 9 cents per bushel in our favor. We are morally certain that as good prices can always be had in Duluth as in Chicago and when proper and ample storage facilities are afforded at the [illegible] than one through rate but it does not apply in this case, the difference being 24-10 cents per bushel in our favor.

	Cts. per bu.
Rate Minto to Chicago on C. M. & St. P.	24.6
Rate Ellendale to Chicago on C. M. & St. P.	27

Minto being one mile the furthest away.

In the class rates we regret to find we are not able to make so satisfactory a showing. The classification used is a very high one and is apparently confined to the St. P. M. & M., N. P. and Canadian Pacific Railway. A. T. & S. Fe and Denver and Rio Grande Railways use a much more liberal one. In addition to this evil our 3d and 4th class rates are higher than on most of the roads given, which make the rates on the freight in those classes very high. Nearly all the articles in every day use, in groceries, hardware and building material, are raised one class, thus making an appreciable difference in the rate of carriage for them. If the A. T. and Santa Fe can use so liberal a classification we do not see why the St P. M. & M. cannot adopt a similar one and would respectfully bring this point before the notice of the committee.

On lumber we are in a better position than people living along the Northern Pacific.

A new schedule of emigrant rates, more favorable to all points than existing ones is in preparation. On agricultural implements we can but call attention to the descrepancies. The explanations on this point is that the roads further south have manufacturing centres carrying the raw material in and shipping the machines out, besides the other freight necessarily used in populous places.

From a comparison of the tariff of this year over last we find a reduction amounting in the aggregate to close on one million dollars was made, although most of it was on class goods, where the farmer could not so clearly perceive the benefit as if it had been on wheat.

A further and substantial reduction is promised as soon as the railway fiscal year ends which will be on June 30th, 1884, and we are assured that wheat, coal and lumber will receive the first and greatest consideration when the time comes.

To make an investigation such as ours has been is a difficult matter; so many different matters having to be examined and allowances made. We are pleased to bear testimony to the kindness of the Manitoba officials, every opportunity being given to make our examination as thorough and complete as possible.

For some time to come we can scarcely hope to see the rates for the transportation down as low as many of us have been accustomed to. The climate, the cost of fuel, the sparsely settled country, and the distance from manufacturing centres preclude that.

When the local traffic assumes such regular proportions at all seasons of the year as will enale the railroad company to convey it more equally in either direction, in addition to a substantial increase in the quantity, than we may expect freight and passenger rates.

As it is at present the majority of the cars are almost invariably carried one way empty. In the fall and winter they are carried full south and empty north; in the spring and summer the reverse is the case being carried full into the valley and empty back. Notwithstanding all this, we think there is room for a substantial reduction, even at present.

In this connection it may not be out of place for this committee on rates to bring before the farmers the necessity for diversified farming not only as being a matter of profit but also as being one way of remedying the difficulty. Nature never intended ours to be ought else than an agricultural district or coal and iron ore would have been placed convenient for use. Being then an agricultural country, let us take full advantage of its opportunities, and not devote all our time, energy, and care to raising wheat alone. In doing so we are neglecting valuable interest and running a serious risk of financial disaster should a failure of crops ever occur. When we have absolutely nothing but wheat to ship, the railway company is rushed with traffic for a few months in the fall and early winter and for the rest of the year has little to do. They must therefore make the rates sufficiently high in order to pay them for keeping the road open in slack as well as busy seasons, and for the extra hauling of their cars as previously explained. If farmers once commenced raising stock, there would soon be lots to ship out, and the traffic be more generally equalized, consequently a lower tariff might be expected. Less machinery would be needed, the farm made more self-producing, and railway rates saved in each item. This is but one view of it, the other being the more important one that the farmer would not be wholly relying on one source for his income, but should that fail, he has then something left to fall back on sufficient to enable him to tide over the difficulty irrespective of elevators grades, or bad crops. Respectfully submitted.

E. O. FAULKNER.
W. N. ROACH.
JOHN DE GROAT.

Studying these tables and statistics, one will readily see that on wheat rates we have the advantage over points on the Milwaukee, Northwestern and Northern Pacific, equally distant from purchasing market and while this may not be a source of congratulation, it is nevertheless an important factor, tending to show that the Manitoba road is not the merciless monopoly that is sometimes claimed. Railroad corporations are organized and run for profit, and not for amusement, their chief end is to make money for their owners, and in this respect we find the Manitoba officials excellent conservators of stockholders' interests. Your committee claim through its representative of the business interest of the valley, that in [illegible] the time had come when [illegible] flour, coal and lumber in addition to the lowering of the classification as recommended by the rate committee.

To this proposition the railway responds: It is our settled policy to reduce freight rates in proportion to increased tonnage and our records show (which the committee finds to be true) that the average reduction of our last fiscal year was nearly ten per cent. If the Manitoba railway had charged the same rate of freight the past fiscal year which elosed June 30th, 1883, as in the year closing June 30th, 1882, it would have received nearly a round million dollars more, net.

Mr. Hill speaking authoritatively for the corporation he so ably represents, said: "While I cannot promise definitely what the per cent of reduction will be, yet I assure you, gentlemen, that a reduction will be made, if the business of the year justifies it; and I further assure you that the expressed views and wishes of your committee as to where the reduction shall be placed, will receive proper consideration."

More than this, could your committee reasonably ask?

WHEAT INSPECTION—GRADING—WEIGHING.

No subject was more interesting nor more intricate in its details than this. None was more often canvassed, and none found more perplexing. How to remedy the proved abuses of the present year was often asked, and never satisfactorily answered. It had suggested itself to, and been thought of by Mr. Hill. He favors and adduce weithty reasons therefor, an inspection, created and regulated by the State or Territory. He would have a State or Territorial board of commissioners, appointed by the Executive and Legislative authority, whose duty it should be to establish a standard system of weights and grades to which all subordinate inspectors, as well as buyers, should conform. In connection therewith local inspectors, covering a district not exceeding one hundred miles of road, whose duty it should be to visit every elevator in his district, at least once each week, to settle and adjust any and all differences between buyer and seller, subject, however, to the right of appeal to the general commissioners; who should also see that scales are properly balanced and sealed, and not tampered with. By this system the grade of wheat at the purchasing point would be the same as at the selling point. All these officials to be paid by the State or Territory, to be under bonds for the faithful discharge of their duties under the solemnity of an oath, and if guilty of malfeasance in office, be subject to the pains and penalties of felony. That elevators be required to have open scales, proper facilities for cleaning, and any elevator agent guilty of weithing or grading falsely, be imprisoned in the penitentiary, with the pardoning power taken from the hands of the Executive. One or two instances of punishment would, he believed, suffice to remove the temptation to whigh or grade falsely.

Your committee became acquainted with Mr. Harbaugh, the owner of the Lockhart and Keystone farms in the valley on the Minnesota side, and who has hundreds of thousands of dollars invested in farming pursuits in our section. We received from this gentleman valuable information and assistance, and he has at our request, addressed to this committee, which is herewith appended incorporated his ideas in a letter and made part of this report.

Farmers! It is your duty to study closely the two systems and instruct your future representatives in legislative halls what system shall become the law.

The committee feels under great obligation to Mr. Harbaugh for information furnished and interest shown in the purposes of our St. Paul meeting.

OFFICE OF KEYSTONE AND LOCKHART FARMS,
ST. PAUL, February 9th, 1884.

To the Dakota Farmers' Committee:

GENLLEMEN:—You have asked me to submit my ideas as to the best, most intelligent and practical mode of establishing some system of inspection of grading the cereals of our country, whereby a more equitable and just basis may be arrived at, as between seller and buyer of our grains. As you well know, the present mode of grading the cereal productions of our State and country, particularly at all interior points, is crude, irregular and generally deemed unjust, with no satisfactory representation for either seller or buyer. It has, therefore, become patent to every intelligent thinker, that the law making powers of the State of Minnesota, (and which will apply equally well in adoption, to the Territory of Dakota which you represent, whose agricultural interests may be considered identical with ours,) should at the earliest day possible enact such laws and regulations as will in their wisdom, cure and overcome the many difficulties complained of, so far as it is possible for human legislation to do.

The matter of determining qualities, grades and consequently values of the cerals of our country, is surrounded with great difficulties and obstacles and which has taxed the minds of producers and consumers, buyers and sellers, for many years. I have always thought the highest and most practical intelligence possible should be brought into service, in determining grades and values of our important staples, in which the very existence of the human family so largely depends, and this is peculiarly the case with our Northwestern cereals, which I believe have intrinsic qualities and values which will be more and more appreciated in the future. Our laws, should in my judgment, be so framed as to make it the duty of the judges of the supreme court of the State, to appoint the most eminently qualified person that can be found, to the position of "first inspector," of the State, and also appoint a first assistant and a second assistant, or more, if thought advisable, experts in the business and competent for their positions. Whilst it may not be thought proper by legislative enactment to place the appointing power in [illegible] subserved, so as to be as far as possible, independent of parties, and for this reason I make the suggestion.

Let a suitable place by provided where an "experimental station" be established, and where the various samples of the products of this and other countries can be exhibited, referred to, and tested, and if desired make this station somewhat similiar to the one recently established by the State of New York, at Geneva, New York, where facilities are afforded to test the culture, the produtions and analysis of the various productions of the husbandman, and weekly reports are made for the benefit of the public at large. Let the inspector, with his assistant meet annually, representatives from the various boards of trade of our State, representatives from the various milling points of our State, as well as representative agriculturists from the several congressional districts of our State, and in joint convention decide upon a standard of grades for all of our cereal products. Let the appointing power for deputy inspectors or graders for all points within our State, decide upon the chief inspector and assistants after, establishing the headquarters for this work with all the appliances necessary to make chemical and mechanical anlysis of our products. Whoever wishes to become a deputy inspector, let him make application to fill the position at any certain point or depot where cereals are received, bought or sold, and before appointment undergo a competitive examination at the expermental station, and demonstrate to the board, his qualification and fitness for appointment. Let it be the duty of the board to teach applicants the mode and manner of making the ordinary mechanical analasis whereby the grade, condition, quality, action in water, color, gluten and milling value can be arrived at. I am informed that this is done daily by an expert at the Pillsbury mills, whereby uniformity is arrived at. It is therefore manifest the eminent success they have met with, can in a great degree be attributed to the intelligent mode of their doing their milling, and this will apply equally well to other milling firms who conduct their business on an equally intelligent basis. Let each and every deputy be furnished with standard samples. Let all be under the solemnity of an oath to do justice to all concerned. Grades made at any receiving point within the State. The chief inspector and his assistants to act as umpires where any differences as to judgment arises. I have not time to go into further details. I hesitate to submit my ideas to you, I expect them to be criticised. They are my own. It may at leaset have a tendency to bring the matter up for general discussion and thought, so that a higher, better, more just standard may be arrived at. We have the country, climate and soil, containing the chemical elements to produce the quality of cereals the world needs. It is therefore important we should take a forward step whereby our products and our labor will be appreciated.

We must not forget the great interest of our Northwestern country is agriculture, and we have direct community of interest with the millers, whose interests we should endeavor to foster by agriculture and manufacture. we thrive, and on which all mercantile and commercial interest, as well the future wellfare of our country so leagely depend. I wish you to distinctly understand that my only object in making these suggestions is to contribute what I can, to come at the evils weighing down an embarrassed industry.

Respectfully submitted,
SPRINGER HARBAUGH.

GENERAL RECOMMENDATION AND SUGGESTIONS.

Many other topics both interesting and instructive to your committee were considered, but the length of this report forbids their mention in detail.

We are convinced that the suggestions of the rate committee as to diversified farming are timely, beneficial not only to the farming interests but to the commercial as well. Dependence is always servile. Practically wheat is our only crop. It should not be so. The time has come in our development when we should raise our own stock, make our own butter, and instead of importing poultry and eggs, export the same. It has been demonstrated that our grasses are as nutritious and strengthening as any. That hay native to the soil can be raised and husbanded at as low a figure as in any part of this country. Why, therefore, should we import our beef, mutton, pork, butter, eggs and poultry longer, when they can be produced as cheap as any where in the United States. Why not diversify our farming. "The gods help those who help themselves." We can find a remedy for present abuses by being more independence will come from varied pursuits and from more careful and economical husbandry. If the Red River Valley with its marvelously productive soil is to maintain its reputation as the place or industrious and ambitious men, it must come in the opining of your committee through intelligence, directed to diversified farming.

In conclusion, what then has the committee accomplished and what will be the future benefit of its deliberations to our country. Summarized, we say for the future a wheat market open to competition to any buyer or combination of buyers, the privilege of shipping wheat through to any eastern market if desired; the co-operation of the Manitoba Railroad officials in finding a remedy for elevator abuses and preventing the same; their cordial support and promise of aid in securing the passage of a just law regulating the weighing and grading of grain, and most important of all an expressed willingness on the part of the railroad company to reduce freight rates from time to time, as the business of the company justifies.

Your committee desires to testify to the willingness of Mr. Hill not only to listen to grievances, but to work for their correction. We were impressed with his sincerity and believe that he is thoroughly in earnest in his expressed determination to do any and every thing in his power to promote our prosperity, and we have returned convinced that we should there [illegible]

'ROUND HOME.

Capt. Arnold left for Wabasha on Friday morning.

The freight train was delayed several hours on Tuesday owing to the storm.

Don't forget the Grand Concert to-morrow evening. A big time is expected.

Wm. Anglim has returned from a business trip to St. Paul and Minneapolis.

Joe Mathews returned on Tuesday nights' train from St. Paul and Minneapolis.

Mr. J. P. Nelson, of Warren, started this week for California via. the Northern Pacific route.

The concert to-morrow night is for the benefit of Maxwell Division Railway Conductors.

Don't forget that concert to-morrow evening. A good time is assured. Secure your seats early.

Mrs. H. G. Palmer, of Warren, was visiting in the city last week while H. G. was in attendance on the convention at Moorhead.

J. R. Decker, of Argyle, shook hands with us on Wednesday morning. He was formerly connected with the Leader, at Stephen.

Mr. A. M. Stewart left for Duluth, via St. Paul and Minneapolis, on Friday morning after another big stock of lumber for the spring trade.

Services will be held at the Norwegian Lutheran church on Sunday evening, Feb. 2d, at 7:30 o'clock, Rev. A. C. Anderson will occupy the pulpit.

Millinery goods will be sold at cost for the next 20 days at Mrs. P. U. Jennings to make room for new goods after which time she will constantly keep on hand all the latest styles and novelties belonging to the trade. [43-tf]

Sewall P. Norton has rented the Lake View hotel and will open it to the public as soon as he can make necessary arrangments. Norton will make a genial "mine host" and will keep a No. 1 house.

Our dramatic company are preparing for "Led Astray" which will be presented at Ericssen's Hall on Wednesday and Thursday March 11th and 12th 1884. Tickets for sale at Morris Bros. jewelry store.

Dr. Hall, who placed the Fargo Republican among the leading dailies of the Northwest and who has so ably presided over its destines, has sold his interest in the Republican and with his son gone east for a visit. We wish the Dr. abundant success in whatever undertaking he may embark in the future.

While in Minneapolis last week, we met Capt. Geo. A. Freudenreich, of Odessa, Russia. The Captain's four years' residence in Russia seems to have agreed with him as he was looking hale and hearty. He sails from New York on his return on Saturday, March 1st. He says that his business will keep him there about two years more.

The Convention of Red River Farmers, held at Moorhead last week, was well attended and much good will doubtless come of it. Dr. Collins, of Grand Forks, was elected chairman, and W. R. Edwards, of the Warren Sheaf, secretary. Ways and means for relief were discussed during the several days conference and a convention appointed to meet some time in the near future in St. Paul.

While in Minneapolis on Monday we dropped in to chat with Mr. E. S. Corser who, among other things said that he was very confident that the Duluth & Winnipeg R. R. would soon commence work all along the line. Mr. Corser informed us that he intends to put a herd of polled Angus cattle upon his farm at an early date. He has also purchased a large quantity of forest trees of Mr. Haseltine and will set them out this spring. He is very enthusiastic over the future of this country.

Our old friend E. B. Chambers, the pioneer editor of the Northwest, took occasion of our absence in St. Paul to invade our sanctum, with his little grip, representing that excellent paper, the Fargo Republican. Mr. Chambers established the Red River Valley Gazette, at Glyndon in 1872 and ably conducted it until the spring of 1875 when he consolidated it with the Fargo Express and the Fargo Mirror removing to Fargo and establishing the Fargo Times which paper he afterward sold to E. D. Barker, (now of the Hillsboro, D. T. Banner,) and retired to private life upon a farm. Mr. Chambers reports that his efforts at farming have been very successful but we surmise that a pastoral life does not suit E. B.'s restless active mind exactly and that he will be in the harness again erelong. We regret that we could not have been here to welcome him.

John Meser left on Friday morning for a short business trip to St. Paul and Minneapolis and may continue it to Wisconsin ere his return.

Tuesday was a right smart sort of a day. Old Boreas had lots of fun and delayed the train from the south two hours or so and on its arrival it had to remain till morning on account of deep snow in the big cut.

The farmers meeting, owing doubtless to the inclement weather was poorly attended not enough getting together to elect the officers. It was postponed until next Wednesday, March 5th when when it is hoped a large attendance will be there ready to listen to some important reports and to elect the officers. Let there be a grand rally.

Mr. Lynn Carruth and wife, from the frozen zones of the N. W. T. are visiting this week with Mr. and Mrs. V. D. Carruth and friends in the city. Lynn proposes to take back a thermometer that is able to catch and measure the weather in that country as all the weather gauges got discouraged at about 48 degrees.

Mr. Sewall P. Norton has returned from a successful visit to St. Paul whither he went to settle for shortage on wheat. He says that he is perfectly satisfied with the issue and that he will obtain justice. He assures that he understands these matters far better than he could have done had he not gone down and thinks the railroad company intends to do the fair thing.

Herbert and A. L. Jackson have been to St. Paul in the matter of wheat shortages and returned on Tuesday night. The matter is to be satisfactorily adjusted immediately. The railroad company are taking great pains in these cases and seem determined to see that justice is done the farmers as far as possible which fact looks very encouraging for the future of this country. They seem to appreciate the situation fully and to have a disposition to meet it squarely and fairly.

The old popular W. V. Breyer Company is again in the Northwest and headed this way. W. V. his wife and Baby Breyer are old favorites in the Northwest and their coming among us again will be hailed with delight. We are pleased to be able to announce that W. V.'s health is very much improved since his last visit, in fact "Hal is himself again," and he informs us that he has with him the best troupe that he ever brought to the Northwest and an entirely new list of plays. Look out for a big time and lots of fun when Breyer comes.

An accident happened in the yard on Wednesday morning which had all of the elements of a first-class smashup excepting mangled and crushed humanity. The down train was a double header and in order to get through the cut it was necessary to go into it at about forty miles an hour. The train made the cut all right but at the entrance to the yard struck a defective switch which side-tracked the head engine and derailed the second driving the tender half way through the mail car and bringing the train to a dead halt with no further damage to the train. The leading engine dashed forward into a box-car smashing it into kindling wood and scattering merchandise about in a very promiscuous manner. Both of the engines were badly wrecked but fortunately no one was hurt.

Total majority against the bonds 1727, which means that Polk County decides by a large majority to abide the [illegible] rather than by bonding [illegible]

Mr. Damon Dodge, of Liberty, gave us a call on Wednesday. He says that the cause of the defeat of the bonds was owing to the manner in which the proposition was worded. He thinks a proposition to give a bonus of $200,000 outright, the bonds not to be issued until the road is completed and in running order to Duluth, would meet with a far different reception.

We have received a specimen copy A. M. Purdy's Seed, Plant and Tree Catalogue. It is a beauty. The colored plates of his new seedling Raspberry the CRIMSON BEAUTY and his "Latest of all" strawberry, the JUMBO, are very fine indeed and should be seen by every lover of fruits. The information given on growing strawberries, raspberries, blackberries, grapes, &c., is very valuable, while his prices for plants, trees &c., are as low as any reliable grower or dealer. The Catalogue, or a specimen copy of his valuable monthly paper the Fruit Recorder, can be seen at our office, or by dropping a postal to A. M. PURDY, Palmyra, N. Y., a copy of either or both will be sent to you free.

PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS.

At the commencement of the weeks business in congress a bill was placed before the senate before introduced by Mr. McMillan, to provide for the erection of a public building at Winona. It appropriates for this purpose $100,000 and $20,000, or so much thereof as necessary, for the purchase of a site.

The resolutions of the St. Paul chamber of commerce and Minneapolis board of trade opposing the forfeiture of Northern Pacific land grants were presented by Mr. McMillan. Bills were introduced admitting Dakota as a state and providing for carrying on river and harbor improvements by contract. Bills passed authorizing the sale of timber on certain lands reserved for the Menomonee Indians in Wisconsin, and providing agricultural lands for the Southern Utes in lieu of lands hitherto provided. The debate on national bank circulation was resumed.

William H. Dickson was confirmed as United States attorney for Utah.

Nominations—Emanuel J. Swanstrom, Minnesota, receiver of public moneys at Duluth; Zachary T. Benton, Montana, receiver of public moneys at Helena; William R. Wheaton, California, register of the land office, San Francisco.

Several resolutions were presented in the house by Mr. Washburn of Minnesota, from the chamber of commerce of St. Paul, requesting the Minnesota senators and representatives to endeavor to secure the ratification of the treaty with the Sioux Indians for opening the Sioux reservation for settlement and against revoking or impairing the grant of lands to the Northern Pacific railroad company.

Mr. Nelson introduced bills for the relief of Charles E. Molen and Anna W. Osborne.

A bill was introduced by Mr. Washburn today for the relief of citizens engaged in the suppression of the Sioux Indian war in Minnesota in 1862. He also introduced a bill granting a pension to Hiram Ramsey.

Bills and resolutions were introduced amending the sinking fund act; regulating the tariff of railroads aided by government bonds; providing for the payment of costs of surveying lands granted the Northern Pacific; calling on the secretary of the interior for information as to when the line of the Northern Pacific was finally located, and whether the company claims land on which homestead or pre-emption entries had been within the limit of the grant prior to defining the location of the road; appropriating $500,000 for the relief of lower Mississippi flood sufferers and to distribute seeds among them. Bills passed relieving certain soldiers from the charge of desertion, and making the rate of postage on second-class mail matter when sent by persons other than publishers or newspaper agents. The Republicans filibustered on a motion to suspend the rules and adopt a resolution fixing a day for the consideration of the bill pensioning veterans of the Mexican war. Motions to adjourn were voted down. A call of the house was ordered.

After the reporting of bills from various committees, the financial debate was resumed, and continued until adjournment.

In executive sessions, John Coburn of Indiana was confirmed as associate justice of the supreme court of Montana.

Nominations—Max Weber, New York, consul at Nantes; H. B. Triste, District of Columbia, consul at Mozambique.

There was no session of the house Tuesday. The legislative session of the previous day did not adjourn until nearly morning, and the members were too much exhausted for another session. The scenes and incidents of the past night were too much for them, and members repaired to their residences for the rest of the day. No committee meetings were held. The scene of the night took place about two o'clock, Hiscock, Reed, Morrison and Tucker taking the principal parts; and after a public exhibition Morrison and Hiscock both apologized for unkind personalities used in the heat of debate.

The following resolution was agreed to in the senate:

Resolved, That the secretary of the interior inform the senate when and how many acres of indemnity lands were certified or patented to railroad corporations in Iowa, to whom grants of public lands were donated; also whether any such roads are now claiming more indemnity lands, and what quantities.

On motion of Mr. Allison, the senate passed the bill fixing the time for holding terms of circuit court and district courts of the United States, Northern district of Iowa. It fixes the time for terms as follows: At Dubuque first Tuesday in April and third Tuesday in November of each year; Fort Dodge third Tuesday in January and June; Sioux City second Tuesday in May and first Tuesday in October. Mr. Sewell's bill appropriating $600,000 per annum for militia passed.

A joint resolution appropriating $150,000, to be expended for educating Indians was adopted in the house.

In the senate a bill reported by Mr. McMillan, from the committee on commerce, was passed, giving the secretary of war authority to compel the alteration of railroad or other bridges spanning navigable waters of the United States, which may be obstructions to navigation.

A bill was introduced to enlarge and strengthen the Sny levee on the Mississippi river. The bill for punishing persons for falsely personating United States officers or employes passed. A joint resolution was adopted appropriating $10,000 for the contingent fund of the senate to defray expenses incurred in investigations. The national bank bill was again debated. Adjourned.

During the session the speaker laid before the house the following message from the president: To the House of Representatives—I transmit herewith the report of the secretary of state of the 21st inst., whereby your honorable body, and through you the people of the United States may become apprised of the generous contribution made by her Britainic majesty's government towards efforts for the relief of Lieut. Greely's Arctic exploring party, by presenting to the United States the Arctic steamship Alert. CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

When the reading of the message was finished, Mr. Randall called for the reading of the report in full. The offer was so generous, coming from a friendly power, it ought to be treated with respect. The report of the secretary of state was read and several times applauded.

Mr. Randall asked unanimous consent that the communication be spread upon the journal of the house. He further asked that the communication be referred to the committee on foreign affairs with the object of having a more formal and appropriate recognition of the act of the British government. [Applause.]

"I object!" exclaimed Mr. Finnerty.

Mr. Randall then put his request in the form of a motion, and it was agreed to, Messrs. Finerty and Robinson (N. Y.) alone voting in the negative.

Finerty declared that the United States should not be put to shame by the acceptance of any such favor.

"We are too great a nation," he said, "to humble ourselves so far as to receive assistance of that sort. If we have no ships of our own, we have money enough to buy them, and the British flag shall not float over American seamen. The members of congress who vote for accepting the offer will sign their political death warrants, and the party that favors it will insult the Irish-American voters, who will resent it at the next election."

The committee on foreign affairs will report on the subject early next week, and when it comes up in the house for action Finerty will be heard from.

The military appropriation and post route bills passed the house.

An Incident of Theatrical Life.

A newspaper man listened to the stories of leading actors the other day. Here is one of them:

"Well, now," said the second old man, "I know one more story about a 'Pinafore' company. This time it was in Hartford. The Hebe of the company was a rather attractive girl—at any rate she attracted a swell young Trinity College student to such an extent that he sent her flowers and took her out riding and played the devoted swain generally. The company visited Hartford several times. At last the young man thought he would venture on a decided advance. So he invited the young lady to have a champagne supper in her own room at the hotel after the performance. The young lady went immediately to the manager and asked his advice. He told her what to do. She accepted the invitation, and accordingly, after the performance, a generous spread was set in the room, and the young lady and her swain sat down. The young lady drank very little wine and ate heartily. At the first stroke of midnight a knock was heard on the door. The swain swore, and the girl arose and admitted the manager. He took his seat on the young lady's trunk and said nothing. The generous swain said:

"'Have a glass of wine?'

"'Why, certainly,' said the manager, seizing the glass with avidity.

"He drank the wine and took some more. He did not say a word except when asked to take more wine. He was for that every time. The swain endeavored to carry on a conversation with the young lady, but it was a painful fizzle. Occasionally he looked at the manager and still more occasionally at his watch. But the manager was a stayer, and he got away with two bottles of wine and two hours of time. At two o'clock the swain gave it up. He arose and said:

"'Well, I guess I must go.'

"Shall I help you on with your overcoat?" inquired the young lady, handing him the garment.

"Without more words the swain took his departure and went down stairs, where he indulged in a general denunciation of traveling managers. But he never undertook to 'mash, a pretty star again."

And the flagon of beer went round once more, while Ptarximander reflected on the possible reason why so many "dudes," failed to carry the hearts of actresses.

A Witty Answer and its Result.

An inferior's ready wit is often considered sufficient offset for his misdemeanors. The following is related of Saxe:—

At the siege of Prague, after he had laid all his plans for his final desperate assault, Saxe took a ride in the evening through his camp, partly to see how well his general order were understood, and partly to cheer his men.

As he rode slowly on within his lines, a tall grenadier, who had found jolly companions somewhere, and who had evidently drank as much, wine as he could comfortably hold, in a rollicking, tipsy mood, staggered up and took the general's horse by the bridle-rein, at the same time demanding, in an utterance somewhat thick and uncertain, how much the rider would take for his beast.

"Mon ami, I want a horse. What will you take for this animal?"

Saxe called for an officer of the guard, and directed him to put the man into the guard-tent, and keep him safely until called for.

And on the following morning the great captain had the grenadier brought before him. The man came trembling, but with a cheerful look.

"Well, my man," said Saxe, as the soldier stood before him, "what are you prepared to offer me for my horse this morning?"

"General," replied the grenadier, promptly and frankly, with a sincere, honest flush upon his good-looking face, "the genius that offered to buy your horse last night, I am happy to say, has left the camp; and I hope he will never come back—never! But, general, if he does, I will report him to you at once. I promise it!"

Saxe accepted the grateful pledge with a pleasing smile, and told the soldier that he would take him at his word.

The grand assault, which proved successful, and placed Prague in his hands, was made that very day; and twice during the conflict Saxe received his life at the hands of the grenadier whom he had that morning pardoned.

Once the soldier had led a squad of his stout comrads to the rescue, and once he had saved his beloved general by his own personal bravery and prowess.

FIVE CENTS A DAY.

From the Brooklyn Eagle.

The cumulative power of money is a fact very generally known but not generally appreciated. There are few men living to-day of 65, hanging on the bounty of kindred or friends, but who might, by exercising the smallest particle of thrift rigidly adhered to in the past, have set aside a respectable sum which would materially help them to maintain their independence in their old age. Let us take the small and insignificant sum of five cents, which we daily pay to have our boots blacked, to ride in a car a distance we are able to walk, or procure a bad cigar we are better without, and see what its value is in the course of years. We will suppose a boy of fifteen by blacking his own boots, or saving his car fare, or going without his cherished cigarette, put by 5 cents a day, in one year he saves $18.25, which, being banked, bears interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, compounded bi-yearly, On this basis, when our thrifty youth reaches the age of 65, having set his 5 cents per day religiously aside during fifty years, the result is truly surprising. He has accumulated no less a sum than $2,892.17. A scrutiny of the progress of this result is interesting. At the age of 30 our hero has $395; at 40, $877; at 50 $1,667; at 60, $1,952. After fifteen years' saving his annual interest more than equals his original principal; in twenty.five years it is more than double; in thirty-five years it is four times as much; in forty-five years it is eight times as much, and the last year's interest is $196, or ten and a half times as much as the annual amount saved in fifty years is $912,500 the difference between that amount and the grand total of $3,-893,17, namely, $2,960,67, is accumulated interest. What a magnificent premium for the minimum of thrift will be represented by figures.

A MODERN RESURRECTION.

A Miracle that Took Place in our Midst Unknown to the Public—The Details in Full.

(Detroit Free Press.)

One of the most remarkable occurrences ever given to the public, which took place here in our midst, has just come to our knowledge and will undoubtedly awaken as much surprise and attract as great attention as it has already in newspaper circles. The facts are, briefly, as follows: Mr. William A. Crombie, a young man formerly residing at Birmingham, a suburb of Detroit, and now living at 287 Michigan Avenue in this city, can truthfully say that he has looked into the future world and yet returned to this. A representative of this paper has interviewed him upon this important subject and his experiences are given to the public for the first time. He said:

"I had been having most peculiar sensations for a long while. My head felt dull and heavy; my eyesight did not seem clear as formerly; my appetite was uncertain and I was unaccountably tired. It was an effort to rise in the morning and yet I could not sleep at night. My mouth tasted badly, I had a faint all-gone sensation in the pit of my stomach that food did not satisfy, while my hands and feet were cold and clammy. I was nervous and irritable, and lost all enthusiasm. At times my head would seem to whirl and my heart palpitated terribly. I had no energy, no ambition, and I seemed indifferent of the present and thoughtless for the future. I tried to shake the feeling off and persuade myself it was simply a cold or a little malaria. But it would not go. I was determined not to give up, and so time passed along and all the while I was getting worse. It was about this time that I noticed I had begun to bloat fearfully. My limbs were swollen so that by pressing my fingers upon them deep impressions would be made. My face also began to enlarge, and continued to until I could scarcely see out of my eyes. One of my friends, describing my appearance at that time, said: "It is an animated something but I should like to know what." In this condition I passed several weeks of the greatest agony."

"Finally, one Saturday night, the misery culminated. Nature could endure no more. I became irrational and apparently insensible. Cold sweat gathered on my forehead; my eyes became glazed and my throat rattled. I seemed to be in another sphere and with other surroundings. I knew nothing of what occurred around me, although I have since learned it was considered as death by those who stood by. It was to me a quiet state, yet one of great agony. I was helpless, hopeless and pain was my only companion. I remember trying to see what was beyond me, but the mist before my eyes was too great. I tried to reason, but I had lost all power. I felt that it was death, and realized how terrible it was. At last the strain upon my mind gave way and all was a blank. How long this continued I do not know, but at last I realized the presence of friends and recognized my mother. I then thought it was earth, but was not certain. I gradually regained consciousness, however, and the pain lessened. I found that my friends had, during my unconsciousness, been giving me a preparation I had never taken before, and the next day, under the influence of this treatment, the bloating began to disappear and from that time on I steadily improved, until to-day I am as well as ever before in my life, have no traces of the terrible acute Bright's disease, which so nearly killed me, and all through the wonderful instrumentality of Warner's Safe Cure, the remedy that brought me to life after I was virtually in another world."

"You, have had an unusual experience. Mr. Crombie," said the writer, who had been breathlessly listening to the recital.

"Yes I think I have," was the reply, "and it has been a valuable lesson to me. I am certain, though, there are thousands of men and women at this very moment who have the same ailment which came so near killing me, and they do not know it. I believe kidney disease is the the most deceptive trouble in the world. It comes like a thief in the night. It has no certain symptoms, but seems to attack each one differently. It is quiet, treacherous, and all the more dangerous. It is killing more people, to day, than any other one complaint. If I had the power I would warn the entire world against it and urge them to remove it from the system before it is too late."

One of the members of the firm of Whitehead & Mitchell, proprietors of the Birmingham Eccentric, paid a fraternal visit to this office yesterday, and in the course of conversation, Mr. Crombie's name was mentioned.

"I knew about his sickness," said the editor, "and his remarkable recovery. I had his obituary all in type and announced in the Eccentric that he could not live until its next issue. It was certainly a most wonderful case."

Rev. A. R. Bartlett, formerly pastor of the M. E. Church, at Brimingham, and now of Schoolcraft, Mich., in response to a telegram, replied:

"Mr. W. A. Crombie, was a member of my congregation at the time of his sickness. The prayers of the church were requested for him on two different occasions, I was with him the day he was reported by his physicians as dying, and consider his recover almost a miracle."

Not one person in a million ever comes so near death as did Mr. Crombie and then recover, but the men and women who are drifting toward the same end, are legion. To note the slightest symptoms, to realize their significance and to meet them in time by the remedy which has been shown to be most efficient, is a duty from which there can be no escape. They are fortunate who do this, they are on the sure road to death who neglect it.

Fearful Cyclones at the South.

A terrible cyclone passed near Rockingham, North Carolina, late Monday night, the 18th inst., killing from fifteen to thirty people and wounding a great number.

The cyclone that swept through Alabama on Monday caused the loss of a great many lives and a vast amount of property. At Leeds the residence and premises of Dr. W. F. Wright, a railroad contractor was demolished. The body of Dr. Wright's mother was found an hundred yards from the house, fearfully mangled. Annie, Jeannie, Thomas, James and Edward, children of Dr. Wright, have arms and legs broken. Harriet McCrew, a cook was killed. Of twenty-four carts, two wagons and three horses in the place, nothing remained but the carcass of one horse. Latest intelligence but adds to the horrors of the woful story. From the names of the dead already published it appears that hundreds of lives were lost.

From Georgia the reports are of the same tenor as those from Alabama and in North Carolina, also, and in South Carolina, the lists of the dead are frightful. The cyclone was of the same character as those of previous years, bounding from point to point, [illegible] Southern Illinois, Missouri and Southern Ohio had a touch of the cyclone, and a good deal of property was destroyed, but there were not many fatalities.

Read what the people say concerning the ability of Dr. Thomas' Eclectric Oil to cure asthma, catarrh, croup, colds, etc. Mrs. Dora Koch of Buffalo says: "For croup it is decidedly efficacious." [Mrs. Jacob Mellisor of Marion, Ohio, says the same thing.] S. S. Graves, Akron, N. Y., writes: "Had asthma of the worst kind, took one dose of Thomas' Electric Oil and was relieved in a few minutes. Would walk five miles for this medicine and pay $5 a bottle for it." Druggist C. R. Hall, Grayville, Ill., says: "Cured an ulcerated throat for me in twenty-four hours." "Sat up in bed and coughed till the clothing was wet with perspiration. My wife insisted that I use Thomas' Eclectric Oil. The first teaspoonful relieved me." E. H. Perkins, Creek Centre, N. Y. Thomas' Eclectric Oil is TIP-TOP external application for rheumatism, cuts, scalds, burns, bites, bruises, etc. When visiting the druggist ask him what he knows of Dr. Thomas' Eclectric Oil; if he has been long in the drug trade, be sure he will speak highly of it. Sold everywhere. 50c.-Thomas' Eclectric Oil-$1.00. Foster, Milburn & Co., Buffalo, N. Y.

How a Blizzard Approaches.

A Dakota paper gives the following description of the recent blizzard: "Until about 4:15 the day was sunny, pleasant, and with temperature as mild as spring. The streets were filled with people—ladies promenading in the enjoyment of the 'ethereal mildness.' Suddenly and without the slightest warning a solid white wall of frost and snow appeared in the northwest. It seemed as if the bluffs in that direction had suddenly shot upward to a height of a thousand feet, so sudden and compact did this icy wall appear. In a second of time the storm burst with appalling fury, and the windows which had by mildness of the atmosphere become clear of frost, were heavily coated with cling snow on the outside, and heavily frosted particles on the inside. The air grew terribly cold, and was darkened by flying frost and snow. The high walls of the hotel directly opposite were not to be seen. All objects were hidden by the flying and rapidly driven snow. People on the streets sought shelter and the stores were temporarily used for protection from the fierceness of the howling blast. Darker grew the atmosphere to such an extent that business in the office was stopped until lights were procured."

Mr. I. Carpenter, 463 Fourth avenue, New York, after running a gauntlet of eight years' rheumatism, used St. Jacobs Oil, the great pain reliever, by which he was entirely cured and has had no return of his complaint.

Scotch Fife Wheat for Seed.

General Northwestern Freight Agent Bowden of the Milwaukee & St. Paul, on the 21st inst., issued the following order:

The Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul railway have made arrangements to furnish the farmers on the lines of the Minnesota, Iowa & Dakota, Sioux City & Dakota and Hastings & Dakota divisions with pure Scotch Fife wheat for seed. Without this wheat the reputation of Minnesota cannot be maintained for producing the finest flour in the land. The millers must have it. It is bringing 7 to 10 cents per bushel more than the soft varieties to-day, and we intend that on all the divisions above named a "hard price" shall be made on the next crop, provided the farmers will raise Fife wheat and keep it separate. The first 100,000 bushel will be delivered on board cars at $1.05 per bushel and shipped at the following low schedule of rates in car loads: Twenty miles or under 2 1-2c per 100 lbs; 50 miles, 3c; 75 miles, 4c; 100 miles, 5c; 150 miles, 6c; 200 miles, 7c; 250 miles, 8c; 300 miles, 9c; over 300 miles, 10c. Agents of the company will furnish farmers with any quantity of this wheat at $1.15 per bushel.

My Six Year Old Daughter.

Dr. C. D. Warner:—Dear Sir—I received the complimentary bottle of White Wine of Tar Syrup you so kindly sent me. Our little six year old daughter had a very sore throat, badly ulcerated, and coughed incessantly. We gave the medicine according to directions, and she began to improve immediately and soon got well. Please accept thanks. Mrs. Groves and I have recommended it to others. I shall want to get some of it at the beginning of winter, as I consider it a superior medicine.

Yours very respectfully,

ALLEN'S
Lung Balsam!
A GOOD FAMILY REMEDY!
—THAT WILL CURE—
Coughs, Colds, Croup,
CONSUMPTION.

Dr. Meredith, Dentist, of Cincin'ti, was thought to be in the last stages of Consumption, and was induced by his friends to try Allen's Lung Balsam after the formula was shown him. We have his letter that it at once cured his cough and that he was able to resume his practice.

Jeremiah Wright, of Marion County, W. Va., writes us that his wife had Pulmonary Consumption and was pronounced incurable by their physician, when the use of Allen's Lung Balsam entirely cured her. He writes that he and his neighbors think it the best medicine in the world.

Wm. C. Digges, Merchant, of Bowling Green, Va., writes April 4, 1881, that he wants us to know that the Lung Balsam has cured his mother of Consumption, after the physician had given her up as incurable. He says others knowing her case have taken the Balsam and been cured. He thinks all so afflicted should give it a trial.

Wm. A. Graham & Co., Wholesale Druggists Zanesville, Ohio, write us of the cure of Mathias Freeman, a well-known citizen, who had been afflicted with Bronchitis in its worst form for twelve years. The Lung Balsam cured him as it has cured many others of Bronchitis.

Allen's Lung Balsam
Is harmless to the most delicate child! It contains no Opium in any form!
Recommended by Physicians, Ministers and Nurses. In fact by everybody who has given it a good trial. It Never Fails to Bring Relief.
As an Expectorant it has no Equal.

DEFECTIVE PAGE

WIDOWS OF ALL SORTS.

Their General Character and Eccentricities in Particular.

From the Cincinnati Enquirer.

Young ladies are jealous of her and say, "that horrid widow. I suppose she is setting her cap for another husband. Why, think of it, Tom hasn't been dead three months, and I do declare I saw her smile at Mr. Podkins."

Yet she has a faculty of succeeding, and whether from experience, which is the best teacher—and she has generally been an apt pupil—she has her pick of the beaus, and if the late lamented left a snug remembrance in the form of bank stock or houses and lots, and not too many pledges of affection, she is by no means a drug on the market, but has the pick of the season.

A woman often marries the first time to please somebody else. Her parents, perhaps, or some unaccountable whim which she cannot explain. A widow marries to please herself. She knows the little subterfuges of coquetry—the tiny nothings comprised in the glance of an eye or squeeze of the hand; the die away look of longing, or the pert piquancy of affectionate interest that draws the crusty old bachelor out of his shell and carries in her wake the young one, who lavishes upon her bouquets and smiles.

When the elder Mr. Weller said; "Beware of widows, Sammy," he seems to have struck a popular feeling. He reechoed the sentiments of young debutantes and the innermost feelings of mothers with marriageable daughters. There are various kinds of widows. There is the blue eyed, mush and milk widow, soft as pussy's foot, and always performing the die-away act when anybody is by to catch her before she faints. She continually talks about the late lamented until you know of him as a monument of unheard of virtues, For a time a widow mourns sincerely. She leads a life of cloistered retirement, wearing an impenetrable veil which no peering eyes of curiosity can penetrate. She can't eat, the wine has lost its flavor. She reads over and over again his letters and blots them with silent tears. His picture is under her pillow, her room is decorated with mementoes of him. She wears the plainest of mourning. If she has a child, she'll spoil him, and his every motion and look will remind her of the only man who ever lived. She cultivates the clergy and attends to her masses and vespers, her prayers and confessions with a devotion that is appalling. Men of the world shake their heads and wisely whisper: "She'll come out of all that." And sure enough she does. The French proverb says. "Its hard to grow old gracefully." It is hard for a young widow to come out of her weeds naturally. She fancies everyone is looking at her. She wonders what they will say. But she is lively and young, and youth is full of elasticity and hope. If she could travel, it would do her good. Change of scene, say the wise medical men, Her dress begins to assume a change. Jet ornaments appear, which are well set off by her shapely arms and white neck. Pieces of trimming appear on her dresses, and bombazine is discarded for cashmere. She consoles herself with: "It's black; the texture is the only difference." She talks the matter of dress over with other husbandless females. They lay aside folds to put on ruches, and wonder when the box pleatings come in. Some cynical man who had observed closely this transition, or chrysalis state of widowhood, reduced it to a science, and he claims there are five stages of widowhood;

1. The dress of black bombazine, perfectly plain; a thick crape vail, a widow's cap; no jewelry, except a jet locket; collar, &c., of crape.

2. The veil thrown back over the bonnet, a little trimming on dresses; white collars.

3. The cap disappears; a lace veil is worn instead of crape; more trimming.

4. "Dressy" mourning of silk, with feathers in bonnet.

5. Half mourning-purple and pearl color. Now comes the stage where she's deemed dangerous. She has entered the lists, and her winning ways and experience all make her one to be sought and confided in. Young lovers tell her of their flirtations, and she doles out advice with the wisdom of a chancery judge.

Men make fools of girls, but women of this class make fools of men. The widow spreads her web of flattery and flirtation, and as the poor insect ventures in she rolls him round and round in her meshes, as a spider does a blue bottle fly. Perhaps it is a hard fate for a man whose only fault has been his modesty to be roped in to feed the hungry and clothe the naked, but if the widow had not proposed to him he never would have had the courage to propose to anybody, and he gets a companion and a ready made family instead of toiling on through time solitary and alone, the prey to envy and the victim of despair.

Then there are certain far-seeing women, who, having been kicked and cuffed about considerably by their first husbands, who die and leave them nothing, fall in with some respectable, wheezy old gentleman, who wants a housekeeper and somebody to mix his grog nights and put a hot brick to his feet. Of course this is a chance that is barred against a young woman. She could not be a housekeeper. Society would consider it decidedly improper. But for the widow it is just the place. The old fellow puts his affairs in her hands, her habits of economy and good management commend her to him, and they go in cozily together through life, The world says it's a most suitable match, and the only objection, if any there is, comes from the expectant nephews and nieces who hoped the old fellow would make a satisfactory will and peg out before any designing woman made his acquaintance.

In white caps and frills, with winning ways, or, more often, a manner that can be characterized as having their eye teeth cut, widows have been a favorite character with our leading play wrights. Sheridan, in his famous play of "The Rivals," makes Mrs. Malaprop, one of the most amusing widows on the boards declare to Miss Lydia Langulsh: "I am sure I hated your poor dear uncle before marriage as if he had been a blackamoor—and yet, Miss, you are sensible what a wife I made! and when it pleased heaven to release me from him, 'tis unknown what tears I shed!'

In Arthur Murphy's comedy of "The Way to Keep Him" the author bestowed great pains on the character of Widow Bellmour, a part well calculated to set off the finenesse and graces of a spirited and accomplished actress. She is not decidedly a lady of fashion nor altogether a woman of sentiment; yet she has her gay fits and her grave ones, and either trifles or declaims, as opportunity offers and the humor seizes her. She has as much coquetry as justifies a libertine like Lonemore and a coxcomb like Sir Brilliant Fashion in making their attacks upon her. "I have been married," she says, "and am a little in the secret." To win a heart is easy; to keep it the difficulty. In the 'Beaux Stratagem.' by George Farquahr, a most charming widow, all charity, appears, Lady Bountiful. Her husband, Sir Charles, left her worth £1,020 a year, and I believe she lays out one-half on't in charitable uses for the good of her neighbors, She cures rheumatism and broken skins in men; sickness, the king's evil, chin cough and chilblains in children. In short, she has cured more people in and about Litchfield within ten years than the doctors have killed in twenty, and "that's a bold word." In the play of the "Two Orphans" Widow Frochard is leading character, and in McKee Rankin's "Danites" Mrs. Rankin has broken up two companies, all on account of the widow of the piece. In "The Almighty Dollar" Mrs. Gilflory dashes all over Europe, a second Mrs. Malaprop, as a gay widow Getchen in "Rip Van Winkle" was punished for treating a good husband ill by getting a tartar who beat her to death. In "Lady of Lyons" Colonel DeMas says his profession is to make widows, not wives; and Widow Melnotte exclaims: "There is no divorce between mother and son!"—a sentiment peculiarly appropriate in this age of divorce. In "Faint Heart Ne'er Won Fair Lady," by I. R. Planche, which Alice Dunning Lingard and Madam Vestris shone in, the Duchess de Torenueva, though offered the crown of Spain, prefers a young lieutenant of o'erweening impudence and noble blood—Guy Gomez. In Wycherly's "Love in a Wood" Lady Flippant appears as an affected widow in distress for a husband, though she is ever ready to declaim against marriage; yet she says to Mrs. Joyner, who keeps a matrimonial broker's office, "Tis well known no woman breathing could use more industry to get a husband than I have." In "The Plaindealer" Widow Blackacre is petulant and litigious, and in every way disagreeable. Shakspeare makes frequent reference to widows. In "Richard III." Widow Anne is wooed by the ambitious Duke of Gloster in the funeral procession, where the memorable lines occur:

> "Was ever a woman in this humor wooed,
> Was ever a woman in this humor won."

Benedict, "In Much Ado About Nothing," tells Beatrice: "If a man do not erect in this age his own tomb ere he dies, he shall live no longer in monument than the bells ring and the widow weeps," and in "Hamlet," the Player Queen in pledging fidelity to her liege lord expresses just the opposite view, and says: "Both here and hence pursue me, lasting strife, if once a widow ever I be a wife." In "Taming of the Shrew," Tranio the servant to Lucentio, says; "If faith he'll have a lusty widow now that shall be wooed and won in a day." And Lucentio, in bidding the guests to a feast at his house, says: "And then Hortensio with the loving widow, feast with the best." In "Macbeth," Macduff exclaims in dialogue with Malcolm in the king's palace: "Each new moon new widows howl; new orphans cry, new sorrows strike Heaven on the face." In "Henry VIII," when bluff King Hal is putting aside his wife, Suffolk says: "Katharine no more be called queen, but princess dowager and widow to King Arthur."'

Who that has not laughed over the various dilemmas the song writers have placed widows in? Who can not almost set before him that typical Irish Widow Machree, and wish that her ardent lover succeeded in his wooing? His argument is irresistable:

> 'To be poking the fire all alone is a sin,
> Och hone! Widow Machree
> Sure the shovel and tongs
> To each other belongs,
> And the kettle sings songs
> Full of family glee.
> While alone with your cup
> Like a hermit you sup
> Och hone! Widow Machree."

The pathetic story of Widow Malone, the lovely widow of Athlone, who broke all hearts—

> 'From the minister down
> To the clerks of the crown,
> All were courting the Widow Malone."

All the lovers were too bashful.

> "Till one. Mr. O Brien, of Clare—
> How quare!
> Put his arm around her waist,
> Gave ten kisses, at laste.
> "Oh," says he, "you're my Mollie Malone!"

And the moral:

> "If for widows you sigh
> Learn to kiss, not to sigh,
> For they're all like sweet Mistress
> Malone."

Mrs. Florence won great applause singing "Widow Bedott," who defied the young men to come after her with a catch me if you can, and her quaint eulogies of "Deacon Bedott."

> "Who never jawed in all his life,
> He never was unkind;
> And though I say, that was his wife,
> Such men you seldom find."

A queer case, and one that should serve as a model, was once recorded of an Irish widow who literally starved herself to death on account of grief at the death of her husband. Such devotion is rarely seen outside of India, where the widows burn themselves upon their husband's funeral pyre. Died last week in King street, Ormontown, a lady of property, a little above 30, who, though in apparent bodily health, has obstinaicty confined herself to her chamber ever since the death of her beloved husband, which occurred about six weeks since, and refused all sustenance but what was barely sufficient to support an existence burdensome. Her chamber was hung around with portraits of her husband in different attitude, which she continually and alternately caressed with a fervor little short of worship, and perpetually expressed aloud her wishes of being with him, as if she conceived his image animated or was susceptible of her devotion. Under circumstances wearing such strong marks of insanity, her reason in every other respect was perfectly strong, her deportment mild and her benevolence to the poor and oppressed cordial and unbounded, which she testified in numerous instances. Her constitution at length yielded to the force of grief and rigid abstinence, and she died, after having refused all sustenance for five days, leaving the remainder of her property to distressed objects.

All widows do not give up the ship as soon as their husbands die on account of the brevity of their breath. Toward the close of the last century a tenant of Mr. Way, at Hosketon, in Suffolk, died, leaving a widow with 14 children, the eldest of whom was a girl under 14 years of age. He had rented 14 acres of pasture land, on which he kept two cows. These cows, with his little furniture and clothing, were all the property he left. The parish of which he had been an inhabitant was within the district of an incorporated house of industry where the rule was to receive proper objects within the walls, but not to allow anything for the outpoor, except in peculiar cases. The directors of the establishment offered to relieve the widow by taking her seven youngest children into the house. When this was proposed to her she replied in great agitation that she would rather die in working to maintain her children than part with any of them; or she would go with all of them into the house and work for them there; but if her landlord would continue her in the farm she would undertake to bring up the whole fourteen without any help from the parish. She was a strong woman, about forty-five years old and of noble spirit; happily, too, she had to deal with a benevolent man. He told her she should continue his tenant and hold the land for the first year rent free, and at the same time, unknown to her, he directed his receiver not to call upon her afterward, thinking it would be a great thing if she could maintain so large a family. But this farther liberality was not needed. She brought her rent regularly every year after the first, held the land until she had placed twelve of the children in service, and then resigned it to take the employment of a nurse, which would enable her to provide for the remaining two for the little time longer they needed support, and which was more suited to her declining years.

The delicate, refined and religious custom of the Hindoo widow, disdaining to live after her husband, mounts the funeral pyre on which his body is placed, displays an amiability or faith only equaled by the doctrines of antique orthodoxy, which condemns every babe not baptized to eternal torments. It is claimed that the custom was introduced with a view of making wives more caretul of preserving their husbands when alive. A wife poisoned her husband, and, to prevent all others from following her example, it was decreed that when husbands died their wives should die with them. This theory is, however, at variance with the idea that the sacrifice must be voluntary. Last season, when the Kiralfy Brothers put on "Around the World in Eighty Days," Aonda, the Rajah's widow and heroine of the play was not anxious to be burned up, and she appealed to European tourists, who rescue her by strategy from her fate. The tourists persuade their valet, Passepartout, to personate the deceased, who, mounting the grave in Hindoo costume, reproaches them for burying him alive, and forbids the unnecessary sacrifice. A Hindoo woman who resolves to die on her husband's altar abstains from food as soon as her husband is dead. She chews betel and invokes without ceasing the god of her husband's sect. When the fatal hour arrives she adorns herself with her jewels, puts on her most costly attire, as if she were going to a festival. Her relatives and friends accompany her to the music of drums and trumpets. The victim affectionately embraces her friends and relations, among whom she distributes her jewels and ornaments. They bless her and entreat her prayers that they may have a like fortitude. The widows generally meet death with heroic firmness and constancy, satisfied that in thus barring themselves from conjugal attachment they deliver their husbands from the torment of the next world, no matter what crimes they may have commited in this. Mr. Holwell, who was one of the prisoners in the famous Black Hole of Calcutta, tells of one Hindoo widow who, on being told the pain she must suffer, put her finger into the fire and held it there for considerable time, after which she put fire on the palm of her hand, laid incense upon it and fumigated the Brahims who were present. Forbes, who spent many years in India, and who wrote "Oriental Memoirs," relates the case of a female whose husband had amply provided for her, and which is unusual among Hindoos, made her entirely independent of her family. She persisted in her determination to accompany him to a better world, and suffered not the tears of an aged mother and the cries of three helpless infants to divert her from her purpose. The funeral pyre was erected, an immense concourse of people of all ranks assembled and a band of music accompanied the Brahims, who superintended the ceremony. The bower of death, enwreathed with sacred flowers, was erected over a pile of sandal wood and spices, on which lay the body of the deceased. After various ceremonies the music ceased, and the crowd in solemn silence awaited the arrival of the heroine.

She approached, accompanied by her mother and three beautiful children, richly attired, and wearing the hymeneal crown, an ornament peculiar to a Hindoo bride at her marriage. After a few religious ceremonies the attendants took off her jewels anointed her disheveled hair with consecrated ghee as also the skirts of flowing robe of yellow muslin. Two prattling babes clung around her knees to dissuade her from her fatal purpose, The last pledge of conjugal love was taken from her bosom by her aged parent, in speechless agony. Freed from these heartrending mourners the lovely widow, with an air of solemn majesty, recieved a lighted torch from the Brahmins, with whom she walked seven times around the pyre. Stopping near the entrance of the bower for the last time she addressed the fire and worshiped the other deities, as prescribed in the Suttee Ved; then, setting fire to her hair and the skirts of her robe, to render herself the only brand worthy to light the scared pyre, she threw away the torch, rushed into the bower, and embracing her husband, thus communicated the flames to the surrounding branches. The musicians struck up the loudest strains, to drown the cries of the victim should her courage have forsaken her; but several of the spectturors declared that the serenity of her countenance and dignity of her behavior surpassed all the sacrifices of a similar nature they had ever witnessed.

As polygamy is allowed among the Hindoos, it frequently happens that more than one widow immolates herself on the dead body of her husband.

One of the most horrible scenes ever enacted in the east was the burning of forty-seven widows at once, on the death of Prince of Marata in 1710. He died above the age of eighty. A deep circular pit was dug in a field without the town; in the middle of it was erected a pile of wood, on the left of which, on a couch richly ornamented, lay the body of the deceased Prince in his finest robes. After numberless rites were performed by the Brahmins the pile was set on fire and, immediately, the unhappy women appeared, sparkling with jewels and adorned with flowers. These victims walked several times around the burning pyre, the heat of which was felt quite a distance. The principal widow, then holding the dagger of her late husband, thus addressed herself to the Prince, his successor: "Here is the dagger the King made use of to triumph over his enemies; beware never to employ it to other purposes, never imbrue it with the blood of your subjects; govern them as a father, as he has done, and you shall live long and happy as he did. Since he is no more, nothing can keep me longer in the world. All that remains for me is to follow him." With these words she resigned the dagger into the Prince's hand, who took it from her without showing the least sign of grief or compassion. The Princess now appeared agitated. One of her domestics, a Christian woman, had frequently talked with her upon religion, and though she never surrendered her idols, had made some impression on her mind. Perhaps they now revived. With the most expressive look she cried out, "Alas! what is the end of human happiness? I know that I shall plunge myself headlong into hell." On these words horror was visible on every countenance, while, resuming courage, she boldly turned her face to the burning pile. and calling upon her gods flung herself into the midst of the flames. The second widow was the sister of the Prince of Blood, who was present and assisted at the sacrifice. She advanced to her brother and gave him the jewels wherewith she was adorned. His feelings gave way, he burst into tears and fell on her neck in tender embraces. She, however, remained unmoved, gazing upon the fire and then on the assistant, Then loudly crying: "Chiva! Chiva!" the name of one of her gods, she jumped into the flames as the former had done. The others soon followed, some with bewildered, downcast and sorrowful looks. One of them shrieked above the rest, ran to a Christian soldier whom she beheld among the guards. and hanging about his neck begged him to save her. The new convert, stunned with surprise, pushed the unfortunate woman from him, and shrieking aloud she fell into the fiery trench. The soldier, all shivering with terror, at once retired, and a delirious fever ended his life the following night. Though many of the unhappy victims at first showed the utmost intrepidity. yet no sooner did they feel the flames than they screamed out in the most dreadful manner, and weltering over each other, strove to gain the brim of the pit, but in vain; the assistants forced them back with their poles and plied new fuel upon them, The next day the Brahmins gathered the bones and threw them into the sea. The pit was leveled, a temple erected upon the spot, and the deceased Prince and his wives were reckoned among the deities.

The English government has made every effort to stop these rites but without much success.

Many distinguished people have preferred widows to maids as partners in life. George Washington, the father of his country, sat early in the days of the republic a good example in this respect The great Napoleon married a widow Scarron's widow became a court favorite. Rousseau went crazy after a widow; and Gibbon, the historian, made himself ridiculous over one, Disraeli married a widow, and three of the most distinguished widows in Europe to-day are the Empress Eugenie of the French, Queen Isabella of the Spanish, and Queen Victoria of the English.

Roman Remains at Mayence.

From the London Times.

Some very interesting Roman sepulchral discoveries have been made lately at Mayence in the carrying out of some considerable excavations and earthworks required for carrying the Ludwigsbahn railroad around the city. Close to the Neuthor the workmen came upon a place of considerable extent, evidently assigned to the sepulchre of civilians. A large number of large and small stone coffins were found at irregular distances from each other, the intervening spaces having been occupied by wooden coffins, as is proved by the fragments and nails which were found. One stone coffin bore a plate, which seems to have previously served as the "head-stone" of a former grave; and all the indications suggest that the place had been used at successive periods as a place of burial. Most of the graves that were opened contained skeletons of women and children, with which lay bracelets, rings, needles, censers for burning incense, etc. There was one metal coffin, in which lay a woman's skeleton, but without any inscription or ornament. In the children's graves there were toys and other objects, generally of beautiful workmanship, such as little bracelets, glass and earthenware utensils, etc. There was one little polished goblet of singular beauty. One stone coffin (the inscription on which contained some mistakes) held the body of a woman, dressed with lime for the purpose of preservation, having the back hair arranged in a long plait of eight strands woven with elegance, and the clearly discernable remains of a cap. The hair is now red, but most probably was once black. There was in the coffin a stone needle-case ornamented with gold bands, two-bone dice, a wooden casket with bronze mountings, the key of which was in bronze excellent preservation, and a bronze ring. As to other objects found in the place, a small bronze figure of a dancing Bacchante, three black earthenware water vials beautifully painted and bearing the following inscriptions, "vivas mi," "bibe," "dos" were especially deserving of notice. A quantity of silver and bronze coins were found, ranging from the time of Hadrian to the end of the third century.

ANIMALS THAT HOLD TO LIFE.

Experiences of a Fisherman with Creatures That are Slow to Die.

"You will hardly credit it," said a Staten Island fisherman whom a reporter talked with the other day, "but the head of a turtle will retain a very marked interests in existence long after its body has been served up in soup and steaks. I believe it is a well-known fact, but I only discovered it six months ago. I found a friend engaged in shelling a small turtle. 'Now,' said he, putting the head on the dresser, 'that will be alive and active to-morrow morning.' Of course I laughed at him, but I agreed to call next day and test his prophecy. Next morning my friend asked me to step into the kitchen. The head was still on the dresser, and though it had been separated from the body for at least sixteen hours, the eyes were wide open and bright.

"Take care," exclaimed my friend, as I put my finger near the mouth. His warning came not a minute too soon. The head of that turtle absolutely jumped at me. Where its motive power came from I cannot explain, but it moved two inches toward me, and snapped at my fingers with a viciousness that could not have been surpassed by a cornered rat. I think it had been holding back its life, as men of strong will power, for fixed purposes, have been known to do, until an opportunity offered to avenge the destruction of its body, for after it had made the effort its eyes grew fixed and filmy, and in an hour it was dead. Next to the turtle in obstinate persistence in living must come the eel. In recognizing the extraordinary length of time through which an eel clings to its being under the most favorable circumstances, people, I think, overlook the most unfavorable condition of all—the removal of it from the water, a state of affairs sufficient in itself to produce death.

"I do not believe that cutting an eel's head off or serving his tail the same way shortens his life much. He dies because he is out of his element, and had he been left unmutilated he would have lived but little longer. Of course, if you put him in sections on the frying-pan you place upon him a greater burden than he can bear, and he dies quickly; but the lesser injuries, affecting only the tail, head, or skin, seem to me to make but little impression. The fact is an eel can live an extraordinarily long time out of water. They habitually leave it of their own accord and wander in the fields that slope down to a creek not far from here. I have often met in the early morning eels making their way down to the creek. They had spent the night in the meadows in search of worms and were going back. Whether an eel or any other fish is capable of feeling acute pain I cannot say. This I can vouch for: When, an eel has been skinned and beheaded and seems to be quite dead, a little salt rubbed on the surface of the body will be apt to restore life quickly. A snake dies quickly under injuries. The average snake will not live three minutes after his head is crushed with a stick. The eye of a wild bird remains bright for some time after you have shot it, and is likely to cause a tender-hearted sportsman on his first gunning expedition a good deal of self-reproach.

"I do not know whether clams have at any time a very self-assertive existence, but that, in captivity, the clam is able at times to make himself excessively disagreeable I have had occasion to know. Not long ago I brought home a big basket of clams. I placed them in a dish pail, and left them in the kitchen. In the middle of the night my wife aroused me saying that there were robbers in the house. With a pistol in my hand I wandered from room to room. I could hear a most extraordinary noise, like a combination of sawing, filing groaning and grunting, with an occasional watery gasp, but, for the life of me, I could not imagine where it came from. At last I went into the kitchen and the mystery was solved. Each clam, with his shell wide open. was making almost as much noise as a bullfrog in full vigor. I filled the pan with fresh water, which brought either contempt or death; that is to say, it quieted them."—[New York Sun.

How Envelopes are Made.

Springfield has six firms engaged in the manufacture of either envelopes or papeterie, or both these products. The Powers Paper Company and P. P. Kellogg & Co. turn out envelopes alone. The Birnie Paper Company confine themselves to papeterie and the National Papeterie Company and Taylor, Nichols & Co. and the Morgan Envelope Company combine the manufacture of both. The company last named is the oldest in the business, having started in 1865, and having manufactured the first lot of papeterie ever thrown upon the market, in 1866. Since moving into its new factory on Harrison Avenue, last summer, it has secured facilities for making envelopes, papeterie, and boxes, which are unsurpassed in the country, and which afford an admirable opportunity to watch the process of manufacture from the beginning. The Company use anually 1,200 tons of paper of every style, tint and quality, the product of envelopes in 1883 having averaged 14.000,000 a month, rising in August to 17,000,000, while the papeterie product averaged 1,600,000,

The process of manufacturing envelopes is apparently simple, although in reality complicated. True there are only three distinct operations to be gone through with—the cutting, gumming and folding, but the blending of the last two operations into one makes necessary the use of a complex machine. There is nothing remarkable in the first part of the operation. The paper as it comes from the factories is cut in squares of diagonals measuring thirty by forty inches, special diagonal shapes being chosen for particular cutting-dies, in order to save waste which would follow from the sheet not being especially adapted to the die. Each sheet will average thirteen envelopes, which are cut out by dies of innumerable sizes and shapes, but all verging on the diamond, 600 sheets being placed on the presses at a time. In spite of all precautions there is a waste of two pounds in every forty, and some idea of the extent of business may be gained from the fact that out of this waste fifty tons are away every year. The folding and gumming machines are now brought into use, and no more fascinating occupation can be found for a while than to watch their lightning like motion as they turn out finished envelopes at the rate of seventy-five a minute. There are sixty-six of these machines in operation, each of which requires no other attendant than a girl who receives the envelopes as they are forced out, binds them, and packs them into boxes. Six of the machines are used entirely for papeterie, five for gumming, folding and printing at the same time, and the rest for plain commercial envelopes. The process is an interesting one, the machines being self-feeding, taking the paper direct from the cutters, and turning the completed envelopes to the packers in lots counted out to suit.

About a gross are laid in a receiving box near the top of the machine, and above this hangs a "picker," the edges of which conform to the edges of the envelope. This works up and down like a flash, receiving mucilage on its edges from little rollers that fly back and forth between a couple of reservoirs filled with gum-arabic. Pouncing on the top sheet, the "picker" catches it up, gumming it with the same movement. Long fingers dart in, seize the captive, and hurry it back a couple of feet to the "plunger," a couple of separators" having shot in beneath the sheet to keep the rest in place, all being done so quickly that the top sheet of those remaining seems to have been the one touched by the "picker." The "plunger," an iron cube, the lower surface of which is the size and shape of the intended envelope, works up and down like a piston, hunching the sheet down through a square orifice that gives the correct shape, An instantaneous folding and pressing operation is performed by some unseen aparatus, and, almost before one has fairly realized that the sheet has been snatched up by the "picker," it comes out of the machine a complete envelope. and, passing along a chain with hundreds of others in order to dry, takes a circuitous route back under the machine, where it drops into the hands of the folder and packer, as mentioned before. The machines which gum, fold, and print, work off only 25,000 a day, or 41 a minute, the sheet having to receive an impression from the types just before it reaches the "plunger."—Springfield (Mass.) From the French: A little boy was sitting by the bed of his grandmother, who was very ill. "Ah, my poor child," she said, "I am very bad; I am going to die." He looked very much mystified for a few minutes, and then suddenly exclaimed: "Why will you die? Does God want an old angel?"

A little four-year-old boy in Hartford, says the Times, was asked once by his father if he wanted some flowers, and replied, "I don't care if I do." The uncle said: "I never give flowers to boys who don't care." Upon which the urchen responded; "I don't care if I do but I do care if I don't."

A Remarkable Case of Imposture.

From the St. James Gazette.

A remarkable case of imposture is reported from Canterbury. About twenty years ago Frances Wood, otherwise Fanny Jordan, of Clapham-hill, Whitstable, age fifteen, received a severe shock. She took to her bed, and gradually grew worse in appearance until her face was completely blackened with the exception of a white mark down the center of the nose. She lost the use of her whole body except one arm, and could take only brandy and water and light dainties. Her case called forth much commiseration, eliciting substantial aid from every part of England. Besides the local practitioners she baffled the skill of three medical men, of standing from other districts, and has received relief from both the parochial authorities and the Whitestable Charity Trustees. A few years ago she was the subject of a long article in a religious journal, in which her sufferings and resignation were recorded.

Hearing on Saturday week that her brother had been sentenced to three months imprisonment, she recovered her natural hue, and when discovered by her mother said, "I felt as if something gave me three raps on the head, and a thrill passed through me." She died on Wednesday: but prior to that sent for a person who had often visited her and confessed that during all these years she had acted the hypocrite, and had been perfectly able to use her limbs all the time. She had systematically discolored her features with burnt cork, which she kept in a box with a false bottom under her bed. On the announcement of her brother's imprisonment, she took an opportunity to wipe away the black marks from her face. The mother states that she was quite unaware of her daughter's deception.

Personal Gossip.

On one occasion during the war, when Anna Dickenson had moved an audience to alternate cheers and tears, Wendell Phillips, who had spoken at the same meeting said to her: "Anna, I would give much to be able to make people cry as yot do. Why cannot I do it?" "I suspect the reason is because you never cry yourself," was the answer.

Mrs. J. W. Mackay's jewel chest, which she keeps in the vaults of a Paris banking house, contains the finest collection of precious stones outside of a royal treasury, that exists in Europe, It is valued at something like $1,000,000. Foremost in the collection shows resplendent the famous set of sapphires which attracted so much attention when exhibited by the jeweler Boucheron at the Parisian Universal Exhibition of 1878. It is valued at $300,000, and comprises the diadem, bracelets, rings, carrings and necklace, with a large pendant. The necklace is double, the upper row being a band of large, square diamonds and sapphires, fitting the throat closely, while the lower row, a wide arabesque of the same stones, supports the peadant. This last is composed of one enormous sapphire, peerless in color and in water, and set in large diamonds. The stone is of the size of a pigeon's egg, cut transversely, a perfect oval in shape, and is alone valued at $30,000.

Apropos of Gambetta's facility in speaking on the inspiration of the moment the following anecdote is told: While journeying one day with a young deputy from Paris to Versailles, he said: "Do not speak to me. I have a long and important speech to make, which I have not even had time to think over." The silence, therefore, remained unbroken. When at last his friend looked round he saw that Gambetta was not deep in thought, but fast asleep, nor did he wake until they reached Versailles. When reminded of the speech he intended to prepare he only laughed and shrugged his shoulders. In the evening, however, he delivered a speech as splendid and finished as if he had made voluminous notes and careful preparation.

"Count William Bismarck, the Prince's second son," says St. James's Gazette, "was, like his father, long troubled with obesity. One happy day a literary friend introduced to him a certain Doctor Schwenninger, a Bavarian, who claimed to have hit upon a regimen which was an infalible cure for fatness. Count William placed himself unreservedly in the hands of the Herr Doctor, and in a few weeks had lost his superfluous bulk. Thereupon Doctor Schwenninger was summond to the Chancellor, whom he undertook to cure, as he had cured his son. At the end of seven or eight weeks Prince Bismarck weighed sixty pounds less, and he now looks upon himself as cured. He sleeps long and tranquilly; he is at his desk at seven in the morning; he takes long walks which would fatigue a young man; and, after ten years' absence from the saddle, he is now able to ride. All this is prodigious; but what is Doctor Schenninger's mysterious regimen?"

Incidents That Come to the Notice of the Dead-Letter Officials.

Washington Letter in the Cleveland Herald.

While I was in the "dead-letter" department the other day one of the clerks engaged in opening letters—at a table near by—called to a gentleman who was entertaining me. He went to him and immediately beckoned for me to follow.

"Now, what can be done in this case?" he says. "Here is a letter, this instant opened, and you see what it contains."

It was a clean, new $20 bill, neatly folded and wrapped in a piece of perfectly blank brown paper—not a mark of pen or pencil to show from whom it was sent. The letter had been advertised as unclaimed and was dead, and the examination of its contents made it more completely dead than before.

"We have nothing but the postmark, and even that is almost obliterated, but our expert will take hold of it and do the best he can with it. There's a pretty slim chance in this case. I guess Uncle Sam will get that money. This reminds me of something in my own experience. A few years ago when I was opening letters I found one just like this, except that the amount was $30, and on the paper wrapper around it was written in pencil, 'A friend, Matthew vi., 3.' I looked that up and found it to be: "But when thou doeth alms, let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth." The letter was addressed to a woman and it was clearly a case of charity. I really felt bad that we could not succeed in finding either party, and that money is in the treasury to-day."

The number of letters opened last year containing currency, checks, draft and negotiable paper was over 34,00 The amount of actual cash taken from letters was nearly $39,000, and the va of checks, etc., representing mone about 1,600,000. During the last ye the number of pieces of mail matt that reached the dead-letter office w nearly 4,500,000! The exact numb was 240,822. This is about 14,500 every day.

SENATORIAL VOTING.

How the System of Reciprocity Works—Simon Cameron's Principles.

Washington Letter to Augusta Chronicle.

Years ago when Senator Matt Ransom, who is one of the brightest of men was a novice in the upper house of congress, the veteran Simon Cameron of Pennsylvania took a fancy to him, and, as is the custom of the older brethren, persuaded him to vote on his Pennsylvania line. Once, in open senate, Mr. Cameron handsomely complimented the North Carolinian and promised to reciprocate his kindness. Now, the Camerons never forget a favor and always repay obligations. This was notably illustrated when a son of Simon paid the political debt of his father to Gen. M. C. Butler. It happened that Senator Ransom had a bill of some kind up and that one vote might defeat it. He recollected the promise Simon Cameron had made and looked around the chamber to remind him of it. He was not in his seat and could not be found in the cloak rooms. Ransom ran down to the old gentleman's committee room and pushed it in. The Pennsylvania senator was there surrounded by a crowd of constituents, all of whom were making merry with unlimited champagne. The old politician did not relish the sudden invasion of his castle and his face was a thundercloud. Affecting not to notice this, Ransom gasped out: "Senator Cameron, you promised to vote with me when I asked you to do so. The time has come. I am in a tight squeeze and you must come to the chamber and help me out." The old gentleman rose in high dudgeon, but went forth to perform his promise. He then returned to the friends he had rather unceremoniously left. About ten minutes afterwards, who should pop in again but Matt Ransom. Walking up to the astounded Cameron he said: "Senator, I have come to ask you another favor." The Pennsylvania glowered at his North Carolina colleague and said with some asperity. "The deuce you have! I don't know that I shall grant it, sir." Ransom replied, smiling: "I think you will when you hear me. These gentlemen shall be judges and jury." Turning to the assembled company he continued: "Gentlemen, for two years past Senator Cameron has voted me at least one hundred times in the interest of Pennsylvania. I have got only one vote from him for North Carolina and he is mad about it. I ask you, gentlemen, if he has any right to be displeased with me?" The men thus appealed to thundered out that North Carolina was acquitted of all blame and that Pennsylvania must be reconciled. Then turning to the old senator, who began to understand and enjoy the situation. Gen. Ransom added: "The favor I ask of you is an introduction to your friends and permission to participate in your festivities!" Old Simon beamed like one of the recent sunsets, and taking Ransom by the hand affectionately, presented him to his guests as "my distinguished rebel friend, etc." General hilarity prevailed, another basket of champagne was ordered and the North Carolina senator became the lion of the hour.

Young War Heroes.

At the first battle of Bull Run John Meigs, a son of General Meigs, and a West Point cadet, seeing no generals about, assumed and for some time directed the movement of the troops, the officers supposing he was an aid-de-camp, and that the orders came from the generals. Seeing the enemy massing in the wood to take Green's Battery, Meigs ordered Colonel Mathewson to move quickly with his regiment to the support of the battery. The movement was promptly executed by the First California, and then two other regiments were brought up, I think the Thirty-first and Thirty-second New ork. Later in the day the youthful eneral, seeing the field was lost, said o Colonel Mathewson; "You had etter fall back toward Centreville."

Cicero—Here, veteran, if you think it right!—strike. (Bowing his head to the assassins.)

Cyrus the Great.—Adieu, dear children, may your lives be happy; carry my last rememberance to your mother, and for you, my faithful friends, as well absent as present receive this last farewell and may you live in peace.

Henry II.—O shame! shame! I am a conquered king—a conquered king! Cursed be the day on which I was born, be the children that I leave behind me!

Queen Elizabeth—All my possessions for a moment of time.

Mary Queen of Scots.—O Lord, in thee have I hoped, and into thy hands I commend my spirit.

Anne Boleyn.—It is small, very small indeed (clasping her neck.)

Empress Josephine.—I shall die regretted; I have always desired the happiness of France. I did all in my power to contribute to it. I can say with truth that the first wife of Napoleon never caused a tear to be shed.

Madame Roland.—O liberty! liberty! how many crimes are committed in thy name.

Cardinal Beaufort.—What! Is there no bribing death.

Rev. John Newton.—More light, more love, more liberty. Hereafter, I hope when I shut my eyes on the things of time, I shall open them in a better world. What a thing it is to live under the shadow of the Almighty! I am going the way of all flesh. I am satisfied with the Lord's will.

Rev. George Whitefield.—I am dying.

Christopher Columbus.—Into thy hands O Lord, I commend my spirit.

Sir Thomas More.—I pray you see me safe up, and for my coming down let me shift for myself. (ascending the scaffold.)

William Pitt the younger.—My country, O, how I leave my country!

Lord Palmeston.—The treaty with Belgium! yes, read me that sixth clause again!

Marco Bozzarris.—To die for liberty is a pleasure and not a pain.

Marshal Murat.—Save my face; aim at my heart.

Lord Nelson.—Thank God, I have done my duty.

Alfieri.—Clasp my hand, my dear friend, I die.

Haller.—The artery ceases to beat.

Mirabeau.—Let me die to the sound of delicious music.

Michael Angelo.—My soul I resign to God, my body to the earth, and my worldly possessions to my friends.

Jean Paul Richter.—My beautiful flowers.

Schiller.—Many things are becoming clearer to me.

Addison.—See in what peace a Christian can die.

Dr. Johnson.—I am about to die.

Dr. Andrew Combe.—Happy! happy!

Headley Vicar.—Cover my face! cover my face!

Robert Burns.—Don't let that awkward squad fire over my grave.

Washington Irving.—Well, I must arrange my pillows for another night; if this could only end,

Franklin.—A dying man can do nothing easy.

Washington.—It is well.

John Adams.—Independent power.

Thomas Jefferson.—I resign my soul to God, and my daughter to my country.

John Quincy Adams.—It is the last of earth; I am content.

Andrew Jackson.—What is the matter with my dear children? Have I alarmed you? Oh, do not cry. Be good children and we will all meet in heaven.

Daniel Webster.—I still live.

John Randolph.—Remorse! remorse! Write it! write it larger! larger!

Stonewall Jackson.—Let us cross over the river and rest in the shade of the trees.

Mozart.—You speak of refreshment, my Emilie; take my last notes, sit down to my piano here, sing them with the hymn of your sainted mother; let me hear once more those notes which have so long been my solacement and delight.

Emperor Adrian.—Oh, how miserable a thing it is to seek death and not to find it.

Stephen A. Douglas.—Tell them to obey the laws and the constitution.

Lord Tenterden.—Gentlemen of the jury, you will now consider your verdict,

Rachael, the French Actress.—And must I part with these so soon! (Contemplating her jewels.)

A ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

Thrilling Incidents in the Courtship of Two English Lovers.

New York World.

Mayor Edson united in marriage a young couple at the City Hall last Friday afternoon whose romantic courtship, thus happily concluded, was diversified by a number of thrilling incidents seldom occurring in real life.

The bride, Miss Maggie Whallie, now Mrs. Charles Hollingsworth, a beautiful blonde, lived in a little town of Skipton, in Yorkshire, England. Her father was a wealthy man, and proprietor of the Maitland House, the largest hotel in that place. Three years ago young Hollingsworth, who is at present only twenty-two years of age, arrived in the town as secretary of the passenger agent of the Midland Railroad. He boarded with a private family named Rose, and it was not long before the daughter of the house, Miss Fannie Rose, a dark complexioned, vivacious young girl of eighteen, fell in love with the handsome, dark-featured young boarder.

He did not return her passion, but loved Miss Maggie Whallie, who had been introduced to him by Miss Fannie herself. The young folks soon came to an understanding and Charles gave his betrothed £100, all the money he had. Fearful lest Mr. Whallie would object to a comparatively poor suitor for his daughter's hand they kept their love a secret, but it did not escape Miss Fannie's jealous eyes.

She began to hate her girl friend, and with her mother conspired to separate the young lovers. The two persons spread rumors derogatory to Mr. Hollingsworth's good name and saw to it that these slanders reached Miss Whallie's ears. The high-spirited young girl believed the reports and at Charlie's next visit proudly broke her engagement with him. In vain the young man declared his innocence.

Rendered desperate by her refusal to believe him, he suddenly drew a revolver, and declaring that he would end both their lives, fired at her. Fortunately the bullet missed its aim. The next instant he placed the muzzle of the weapon at his own breast. With a shriek, Maggie sprang at him and wrenched the weapon from his grasp. She could not withstand this last proof of her betrothed's fidelity, and the young couple became reconciled on the spot.

Miss Fannie thought of some other means of revenge. In some way she and her mother heard of the shooting incident. They repeated it to Mr. Whallie in a greatly exaggerated form. He forced a confession from his daughter. Armed with this, he applied to a county magistrate for a warrant for the young man's arrest, and Mr. Hollingsworth was cast in jail on the charge of having attempted to kill his betrothed. Tne utmost excitement prevailed.

The only witness to the shooting was the young bride. She had been brought into court by her father, and had promised to give her testimony. A few feet from her stood her lover in the prisoner's dock. On the front row of benches sat her rival and the latter's mother.

In a low voice, often broken with emotion, she told the story of her love and trials. She related how she was being made the victim of an odious conspiracy, in which her former friend, Mrs. Rose, and her own father had joined. She had consented to appear as a witness as the only means she had to let the truth be known.

The effect of these words was electrical. The audience broke forth in a wild burst of applause, and the magistrate ordered young Hollingworth's honorable acquittal. A triumphal procession was formed, and the young cou—vulgarity itself is ancient.

They ate sausages and hung up strings of onions. They had stands for public vehicles and the school-master used a birch to the dunces.

They put stepping-stones across the roads, that the dainty young patrician gentleman and the pursy old senators might not soil their gilded sandals.

It was never cold enough for their pipes to burst, but they turned their water on and off with taps, and their cookshops had marble counters.

They clapped their offenders into the stocks; two gladiators were there for eighteen hundred years.

If their rockery broke they riveted it. At Herculaneum there is a huge wine-jar buried in the earth. It has been badly broken, but is so neatly riveted, with many rivets, that it no doubt held the wine kept as well as ever.

Those rivets lasted eighteen hundred years! It is a strange thing to think about, what would the house-wife have said if some one had told her that her cracked pot would outlast the Roman Empire?

Pompeii.

Eighteen hundred years ago, life suddenly ceased in the streets of Pompeii. Many of the inhabitants escaped from showers of ashes and stones which Vesuvius dropped upon the doomed city, but they left behind them hundreds of things which illustrate the familiar saying, "There is nothing new under the sun." An English magazine says:

Those old Pompeiians were very modern. They had folding doors and hot-water urns; they put gratings to their windows and made rockeries in their gardens; their steel-yards are exactly like those our own cheese-monger uses.

Their children had toys like ours—bears, lions, pigs, cats, dogs, made of clay, and sometimes serving as jugs also.

People wrote on walls and cut their names on seats, just as we do now. They kept birds in cages.

They gave tokens at the doors of their places of entertainment—the people in the gallery had pigeons made of a sort of terra cotta.

They put lamps inside the hollow eyes of the masks that adorned their fountains. They even made grottoes of shells ple were conducted out of court.

Fannie Rose and her mother retired to their home. The people of Skipton gave a banquet in honor of the youthful pair, but in spite of all the enthusiasm Mr. Whallie refused to give his consent to a marriage. He kept his daughter closely guarded, and told the young man to go and seek a fortune before he could hope to become his son-in-law.

Charles accepted the challenge, and after having found occasion for a tender parting, he set sail for this country. For a year he worked hard in this city. Circumstances not only favored him, but he also received the joyful intelligence that his bride had fallen heir to $3,000 in her own right. A few months ago he returned to England and arranged with her to come to this country as soon as he sent word that he had a home prepared.

Suddenly Miss Maggie was missing from her home in Skipton, but the last incoming steamship of the Guion line landed her safely in New York. She was met at the pier by her lover, and the marriage ceremony, as related above, concluded the first chapter in this romance of real life. The services were quietly performed, Mr. John Gibbons, a friend of the bridegroom. acting as best man. The happy couple will take up their residence at No. 194 Waverly place.

The Archæological society at Athens has decided to make researches at the bottom of the sea in the Bay of Salamis, where the famous naval battle between the Greeks and Persians was fought. The water is not very deep in the bay. As the present state of technical science enables the society to adopt efficient means of investigation. and as the association possesses the necessary financial strength, it is hoped that the enterprise will succeed. Since the Greeks lost about 50 and the Persians nearly 200 galleys, which have since been lying undisturbed at the botton of the sea, it is thought that it might be possible to bring up some complete specimens, or at least portions of them, which may afford more accurate knowledge of the naval architecture of the old Hellenes and the Persians then can be gathered from their writings.

In the olden times Wendell Phillips was in great demand as a lecturer. Among his stereotyped replies to committees was: "I will come and lecture on a literary subject for $100 a night and my expenses; on 'Slavery' for nothing and pay my own expenses."

LOVE'S MIGRATIONS.

The most exacting of the modern devotees of the æsthetic cannot be satisfied with the æstheticism of the day. For what is it? Only a crazy Ophelia with a garland of wheat and a swinging willow.

The grandmother of this love-lorn maid was called Transcendentalism forty years ago. She was a veritable Jeanne D'Arc. Would she know her child in its crushed-strawberry gown, without an "over-soul," or even an overskirt?

But, such as it is, let me show you one of the sanctums, one of the shrines and altars where incense is burned to the goddess.

Herr Heimlicher's studio has a gay party to-night. There they stand, man and maid, statue and picture, almost indistinguishable one from the other, in the dim mixture of moonbeams straying through the skylight and candles on the tables. The declamatory Herr Heimlicher is mocked in his lively gestures by the graceful arms of a wooden figure clothed in scarlet and gold.

Miss Polimus has posed by a picture of Judith, and her eyes do actually succeed in outgleaming those of that model of womanhood, who stands grasping the grisly manhead. Miss Polimus' eyes have a hungry gleam; one tries to escape them, but it is difficult. They chill one, in spite of their fire. Hungry love may warm; hungry ambition is a frost-bite that stings like heat, but is cold—too cold.

Every one else in the room knew what Miss Pollimus did not know, namely, that Miss Polimus graded her hatreds by the degrees of success of her rivals. She did not know it. For her it was the stupid public whose bad taste she was trying to educate which roused her just fire and resentment. She thought it a pity that Herr Heimlicher should be encouraged in producing those low genre pictures; that Mr. Jones should have been made rich by "sea gulls and rocks and wave crests," always the same "trick" unworthy of an artist. She felt, also, that she ought to tell Amelia Emery that her "interiors" with that everlasting grandmothers' chair by the fireside, were out of perspective, and appealed to a sentimental rather than to artistic ideals; and hence were on sale under false pretences. She did not wonder that Mrs. Aprils cried her eyes out after the rejection of her picture by the best "hanging committee," and had to get it sold in Buffalo. She liked them all; she pitied them all; she thought she did at least. But what appeared pity on her side of the shield appeared jealous hatred on the other.

Her fellow-artists were not watching 'er just then. She thought they would have been (in which thought she was much mistaken), if they had not all fixed expectant attention on a young girl, matron by title recently gained in a very pretty wedding, who formed the centre of the group.

This choice set of fine artists had married "in and in" after a mode quite as Early English as the gowns of their ladies. The gentle five each had found her match among a brave five, and all had planned for a grand picnic, when the remaining bachelor and the last maid should have done the requisite amount of sketching for the wedding picture.

But the bread and honey could not be made to come out even. John Bent was as stubborn as his name, and, though Miss Polimus was willing, it did no good for her to be so. He had been rather "touched," they all thought, by the charms of the lady who, in the talking character of bride, was now seated in the circle of friends, and was just on the point of tuning the keys of a guitar that had known many a song.

"Now," said this lady, "I shall sing a song for each of you, but each must select his or her song; and if you are wrong, you shall pay a forfeit."

At this, several gentlemen; all in fact except John Bent, professed a perfect willingness to kiss her if they failed to encore the right song.

There was no doubt for whom the "Serenade" of Schubert was intended, as the blushes of the gentle artist, who sang a very good tenor, betrayed him. Nor for whom "I Stood on the Bridge at Midnight"—"and took a severe cold"—confessed the gentlemen who chose to confess. The Lullaby was received in tender silence. "I Cannot Sing the Old Songs," was claimed by ten ladies, by no gentlemen. "They Say I may Marry a Laird, if I Will," was humbly accepted by the singer, who remarked that he knew he was not a lord. It was quite too bad to vote "Call me thine own love" to Miss Polimus; rather too bad. "It was a Lovely Violet" was a tribute to the water-colored flowers and tinted eyes of good little Miss Waters. The last song, by George Macdonald, beginning, "Alas, how easily things go wrong!" was moodily acknowledged by John Bent, as probably intended for his consolation.

The great fellow painted tiny things with great pains. "Perfect Meissoniers," his friends said. "A great saving of paint and frame," his non-admirers claimed.

He was at that moment thinking a picture, which was to be not over six-inches square. A lady standing before a red curtain, playing on a guitar and singing; an open letter at her feet, supposed to be the love-letter whose words she was singing out in her joy.

The song and the dreams were soon over. The party broke up after a light supper, rather too many crackers to the amount of champagne to produce much hilarity.

The striking of a clock in a neighboring steeple warned the bridegroom that he must hurry to the Old Square Theatre to make a sketch of the closing tableau in a popular play for one of the illustrated papers.

"Heimlicher," he said, as he hurried off, "don't shut up yet. Let Emma stay here till I return."

"Yes, said the host.

So Emma stayed, but all the others went all except John Bent. He still sat as he had done all the evening, astride a chair, with his chin on the back of it, staring moodily at the candle's yellow flame, which now flared up and wavered, as if going out. The host went to sleep, as he certainly had a right to do in his own room.

The candle at last went out, the particular one on which were fixed the dull, savage eyes of John Bent, and his discontented gaze wandered to the low tete-a-tete, where she of the guitar sat. The instrument-case, looking very like a coffin, lay on the seat beside her. She leaned her head against the high back of the sofa, showing him the profile that John Bent loved. He wondered as he looked at it, if he could not now love that profile in an impersonal way. He laughed then, laughed as he always did when unpleasantly excited, never when pleased; rose and displaced the guitar-case, and without invitation sat and looked at the fair lady.

"You owe me some good advice, at least," he said.

"I owe you much more. I owe you my husband and my happiness."

"Indeed!" he cried, "that is a neat way to put it. By Apollo! perhaps you thought I was proposing for another man! In that case you might have done as Priscilla did for another John."

"Mr. Bent, I protest. You never proposed to me."

"Miss Emma" ("Mrs. Jones," said she, but was not heeded), "you knew that I loved you, and you never let me see. You should have told me you were going to marry another man."

"You should have seen it."

"Oh, yes, of course. I should have seen what no man can ever see—a woman's mind."

Not heeding this thrust, she gently replied, "I tried often to show you the truth, but you were so preoccupied you would not see me."

"Madam I never saw anything or anybody else."

"Sir, you saw absolutely nothing. You were absorbed in the contemplation of your own fancied love. You dreamed, as one asleep dreams, till my marriage-bells wakened you. Let me interpret that dream for you."

"The interpretation is I suppose, that I am a fool."

"Not so, dear friend," said the lady. The "dear friend" winced under the cool endearment. "Not yet such a fool. Now is the time for you to be one; but you shall not be."

"It strikes me that the hunter who tracks the red deer and then lets another man carry off the antlers is some sort of a fool; though I confess I don't see just what I have to do with your marrying another man."

"The power of tenderness," she replied in a very low tone, "is hard to develop in a proud woman who has had few griefs; but without it first love is little more than vanity, and consequently cannot be bestowed as a great gift. But the saving grace of tenderness is best aroused by some one whom we cannot love, but whom we respect; some one, I mean, who loves us, and makes us feel guilty that we cannot give love of the same sort in return. Do not resent my direct reference to a fact so seldom to be spoken of," she continued softly but earnestly. "I say it boldly and truly. Your love for me has made me a nobler, better woman; I cannot think it has not also done you some good."

"Men, I find, are very slow to believe in the grief of women who refuse them." he said bitterly.

"Yes, but they should not be so'," she said, with tears in her eyes. "As for you, John Bent, your power of loving has been developed as well as mine. Yow glory in it, develop it, use it, gain a wife with it."

She said this with fearless emphasis and clear intensity, rising as she spoke and giving him a hand-grasp and a steady look.

The door opened for the return of the artist of the drama, whose voice roused the sleeping host, and the happy bride and groom went away down the long stairs together.

John Bent waited till the footsteps ceased sounding on the stairs; then he said abruptly, "Herr Heimlicher, were you ever refused by a lady?"

"Yes, sir," responded the old gentleman, turning a picture to the wall and putting out the candle.

"Did it do you any good may I ask?"

"Yes, sir, it did," promptly responded the old man,

"Then if I am a better man, you will infer"—

"Show me the improvement first young man," said Herr Heimlicher, pushing his friend through the open door in advance of him, and going down stairs with his hand on the other's shoulder, which was understood by both as an expression of sympathy.

The days went by. Miss Polimus' allegorical drawing of Revenge was not a success. Mr. Bent's "Lady-love" and Song" was; and he bitterly took its selling price and went South.

St. Augustine languishes to be painted in cool gray and strong green, as every artist knows. John Bent went there and cursed the photograph shops, and thought pictures but did not paint. He wandered about and complained to the moon and stars instead. He migrated from one cough-infested boarding-house to another, hating not pitying, the victims. The artistic temperament is the very antipodes of the humanitarian. Discovered by all to be out of tune, by a few discerning maiden ladies was he seen to be lovelorn.

But there came at last a day of fate, or, better, of opportunity.

A more fearful cough, followed by ghastly gurgles, settled in a room across the narrow hall from his. He felt no pity, roused by it from his noon nap, but lay there growling and vowing to go north to-morrow; when, after silence, blessed to the poor invalid and the wicked listener, there came a song, clearly sung in a sweet voice; his song: —"Alas, how easily things go wrong!"

"I am a brute," said the unhappy John. "Things go wrong for some others also. A sweet young girl is caged up there with the dying."

He spoke the truth more exactly than he knew. But when he met the girl, who was indeed sweet and young, there was nothing touching about her. She sat opposite him at the boarding-house table, and he passed her the bread, and stole many glances; but weariness, pain and grief gave her face a dreary rather than interesting expression. She made no effort to please; a great defect in a woman, he mentally commented. He let her leave the table without even offering to get her letters from the post.

Four days passed, in which our hero got passably tired of the sad silence of his vis-a-vis at table, and horribly tired of the sad cough of the invisible lady in the opposite room, behind its ever-closed door. But one hot day, and breathless, the door of the said No. 20 stood open, as did all doors that had windows opposite, in hope of a breath of air passing.

Mr. Bent, coming out of his own door, looked carelessly straight into the opposite one, and then could not look away from the face of the dying lady lying on the white pillows, old, wrinkled, pallid, but still gentle and still fair, crowned with snow-white hair. Her eyes were half-closed, her thin hand, half-holding a magnolia blossom, lay on the coverlid. By the bed sat the daughter, with dry, despairing eyes fixed, not on the mother, but on a square of painter's canvas on which was a touchingly feeble attempt at a portrait of the dying lady.

John Bent did not stop to decide; decision took hold of the man and the artist. He stepped quickly and softly into the room; took with one hand the brush falling from the relaxed hand of the discouraged girl, made a gesture of entreaty with the other, silently took the place she left, and began to paint. He worked till the patient waked from the drowse and must be tended; then, without a glance, even at the girl he left the room.

When he returned from a long walk, the thanks he dreaded waited him in a little white note that lay on his door-sill. He opened the little folded paper very reluctantly, and read:

> "For such a deed I cannot thank you. My thanks would constrain you to do more for me, or to do less.
> "Most wonderingly and humbly,
> ADA STILLWELL."

Now I do not know whether this note pleases the reader; I happen to know that did not satisfy the writer, but did please John Bent, and he knocked softly at the closed door next day and held a very business-like conference with the sad girl about the best hours for future work on the picture.

The picture was painted. Day after day, in the stifling and fetid air, sat the artist doing the best work he ever did, and the girl, sometimes weeping silently, watched her mother die. The last day came, and there was only the picture, and the mother was no more.

The friends came from the North, as friends always do when all is over, and the coffin was carried out of the house. Then had to come the last words, which John Bent dreaded. But she, knowing it was for her to do it, came to him and tried to speak, to say, doubtless, the words she had thought over and chosen as the best. But she could not speak, and only wept, as people do who cannot help it.

You should have seen the effort he made to get through the scene quickly and quietly.

"Miss Stillwell, I know that you with to thank me; I know what you would say. Do not try to speak."

Was not that all? No. She still tried to say something that began with "How can I—,,

"Pay me? he said with a frown.

"Yes," and a trembling pressure of the hand, replied:

"Here is my address and a—a—statement," he stammers.

"Oh, thank you."

"But," he adds, "promise me not to look at it for six months. I can't bear to have you think of such things now." bering the words, and thinking them

She said yes, distractedly, half remem-meant for delicacy.

Weeks after, when she framed the beloved likeness and realized its power, she wondered at the strange request. and did not like to keep her promise, but satisfied herself by laying by an extravagant sum to pay the "good, kind, wonderful stranger," who had taken pity on her.

When she came to open the sealed letter, the stranger had asked more than she had made ready to give, and offered her all he had and was, to make the balance true. Before she could decide what to do, he came and taught her to love the man as she already did the artist.—Woman's Journal.

Personalities.

The estate of Logie-Elphinstone, in Aberdeenshire, Scotland, which includes thirty-eight farms, was put up for sale recently in small lots. the upset price being £250,000, with the view to establishing upon it a peasant proprietary; but only 160 acres were sold, and they realized £6,100.

Henry Ward Beecher preached on "The Moneyed Princes." He said of one who had been down in the street, "indiscriminately a bull or bear:" "I think of him as a friend to humanity; but I approach his web, and a huge black spider comes forth. He is a devourer of men; a man whose soul sits down on the dunghill of filth. God's angels hold their noses when they look down on him."

Senator Vance of North Carolina, denies the statement that a son of his has been appointed a clerk at Washington. The only son of his in any wise connected with "Uncle Sam" is young Zeb, who, having graduated at Annapolis, found himself, together with the rest of his class, legislated out of the naval service. The president thereupon tendered him a lieutenancy in the army, and he passed his examination and is now on duty at the west.

Senator Zebulon B. Vance, of North Carolina, is a famous story-teller. His brother, General Robert B. Vance, who is a member of the lower house of congress, is also a noted story-teller, and is popular among men of both parties in his state, especially among the farmers. He was a farmer for some years after the war. He is a pious man which cannot be said of his more widely known brother, and was once a Sunday school superintendent and class-leader in a Methodist church.

Three lads at Biggs, Cal., aged from eleven to fourteen years, after reading dime novels started out on a piratical cruise. They stole a hand-car and ran up the road to the nearest station-house, which they stoned, breaking the windows and frightening the people within. When the passenger train came along it was a volley of rocks, One struck a man on the head, another badly cut a lady, and several of the car windows were broken,

For 26 years, Robert Joyce, of Chicago, who is now 80 years old, drank incessantly, his giant frame and iron muscles enabling him to withstand numerous quantities of intoxicants. He estimates that he drank on an average about 90 drinks of whiskey per day, which, according to his estimate of the potion swallowed each time, must have amounted to about 2,000 barrels. For many years Mr. Joyce has been sober, and even abstemious, his dissipation having occurred at the other end of his long life. He says he drank the best whiskey he could find, but thinks his preservation is due rather to his excellent constitution than the quality of the distillation absorbed by it. He was never drunk to his knowledge, he says, but he often "felt good." He is not sorry he drank it but, if he had to live his life over again he would not touch it. When he began to drink he was keeping a saloon in Boston. From that he went into the wholesale liquor business. He is now penniless and dependent.

The princess of "crazy-quilt" makers is Molly Williams, a young woman living near St. Joseph, Mo. She has just finished making a silk quilt, the blocks of which are filled in with pieces of the dresses of distinguished women throughout the country. The pieces in the quilt go up in the thousands. Among the ladies who furnished her specimens are Mrs. Grant, Mrs. Sartoris, Mrs. Gov. Knott of Kentuckey, Mrs. Langtry, Fanny Davenport, Ellen Terry, Clara Morris, Maggie Mitchell, Kellogg, Bernhardt, Lotta, Anna Dickinson, Mrs. Hendricks, Phœbe Cousins, Mrs. Fletcher, Mrs. Medill, Mrs. Story, Mrs. Thomas Fletcher, Mrs. Carlisle, Mrs. Watterson and Mrs. Crittenden. These distinguished ladies probably sent the samples out of sympathy for an unfortunate girl whom they evidently regarded as crazier than the craziest of "crazy quilts."

A Broken-Down Miner Finds Himself Worth Thousands.

From the San Francisco Chronicle.

Before the Hale & Norcross fight came on—this is tradition almost—there arrived in town a dissipated miner who had worked in the mine. He was pretty badly broken down apparently, but he went into a broker's office, and after being told to get out as a tramp, he said he thought a good deal of Hale & Norcross and wanted to invest a trifling sum in it. Two feet, at $175, were bought for him, and he gave the certificate to the broker, saying that he was going down to Mexico prospecting, and he would like to leave it behind to be dealt with as the broker saw fit. He was not heard of for months. Hale & Norcross was up to $12,000 a foot. One morning the broker found the dilapidated miner on his doorstep when he came down to business. The miner rose and said:

"Well I'm here. I thought I'd come and see you. I s'pose there ain't nothing left of that Hale & Norcross. I guess you must 'a sold it out, but I'm down an' I ain't got a cent. Maybe you'd lend me four bits to get a bit of breakfast?"

The broker looked at him and gave him $5 to go and get a bath and a breakfast, and presently he returned.

"Sit down and wait a minute. I'll make up your account presently." He left the dilapidated man on the edge of a chair. He came back with a check and sent his clerk down to the bank. The clerk returned with a big bag of gold. The poor devil watched the proceeding with a miserable indifference. The gold was all stacked upon the counter.

"Look here. I've sold your two feet of Hale & Norcross for $25,000, and here's your money."

The miner fell on the floor and cried like a baby. He could not read or write, and had no idea what the market was. He sent a draft of $2,000 to his mother. The broker bought for him $20,000 worth of registered bonds and gave him $2,400 in coin, which he spent in three days. Two bunko men brought him in drunk and tried to get his bonds, but the broker drove them out, and when the man got sober he came and had the bonds sewed into his clothes and was dispatched east. He has never been heard of since.

Tenderfoot in California.

I have a bete-noire. It is—shut the door, whisper softly—it is the funny man from the East. He is all ours. He is as distinctly local as the seal rocks, the Sharon suit, or any of the rest of our permanent institutions. He may not be a funny man at home, but with us he is "very, very funny." He thinks that because we live in the wild West we know nothing of literature, have never read any papers or periodicals, never heard of Joe Miller, or been to a minstrel show. Pitying our inexperience, he proceeds to make it pleasant for us. With the utmost complacency and a slightly patronizing air, he tells us droll stories of Indo-Germanic origin, jokes of the palezoic period. His drolleries are worn so smooth by the friction of ages, that there is not even the hint of an excrescence on which to hang the ghost of a smile. We are silent—with a pale, colorless politeness that is almost ghastly. He takes our silence for mute admiration, and proceeds.

Immunity from danger makes him bold. Presently he himself becomes the hero of adventures that antidate Confucious petrified lies that, too dry to molder, have a mummified eternity. We are still silent. He is delighted with his success. Regretting that he had posed as lion earlier in the day, he confides to us that he was also the hero of the first batch of stories. With the generous hospitality for which we are famous, we refrain from doing him bodily injury. There is no doubt in the world but that this blooming blunderer returns to his eastern home fully convinced that he has mightily entertained us.

Most trustfully I pray that this may meet his eye. It is almost sure to, there are so many of him. Most prayerfully I trust that, seeing, he may comprehend, and, comprehending, beware. I believe that the politeness of the entire State has been stretched to its uttermost limit in this matter. Woe betide the next Eastern man who springs an antediluvian, desiccated joke or story upon us and poses as the hero. Whether he be a strolling player from Nowhere, Mass., or a president or Something from Washington, D. C., his fate shall be the same. I feel that I am distinguishing myself as a prophet when I say that the very next Eastern humorist endeavoring to trade on our ignorance and innocence will be informed that, unless he feels he is wanted over the border-line, he must consent to fill a permanent place in the public cemetery.—San Francisco Argonaut.

The most remarkable, if not the largest, collection of photographs in the United States is owned by Detective Henry Weyl, of Philadelphia. It contains 2,000 pictures of "cooks," and with them are newspaper clippings describing them and their exploits, reports of trials and other memoranda.

The papers report that many people who have suffered by the loss of property from the floods of the Ohio and its tributaries, are proposing to sell out and "go west." They could stand a flood occasionally on alternate years, but drowning out every year is beyond endurance.

Companies for cremation of the dead have been organized in Eastern and Southern cities, and spots selected for the erections of furnaces. This disposition of the remains of the dead was somewhat revolting at first to relatives and friends, but time is gradually wearing away objections, and cremation may eventually come into general practice. Stranger things have happened in this world.

The lists of failures are growing shorter and the signs of improvement in business are becoming more frequent. Confidence is being restored, and that means better times. Nobody expects a revival of speculative booms but the outlook for legitimate business is much better than for months past, This is especially true of the northwest, where the field is open for labor and capital, and is not glutted with the one or the other.

A dispatch from East Saginaw, Mich., says that Col. Hunt, a lately deceased millionaire who had a keen appreciation of humor, bequeathed in his will $5,000 to the mother of Charles Brown ("Artemus Ward"), and a similar sum to Eli Perkins and Josh Billings. Some of the neglected humorists cannot see why Eli Perkins should be virtually designated as a humorist as he has always been classed, whether justly or otherwise, as one of the tribe of Annanias and Saphira. The funny men will now understand that pleasant words rather than satirical are most relished by millionaires.

The old Credit Mobilier, supposed to be dead and buried, with the reputations of not a few statesmen concerned in it, is revived in the United States circuit court at Boston, in a suit involving $16,000,000. The opinion of the court is in substance, that the trustees, Thos. C. Durant and six others, to whom was assigned the contract between Oakes Ames and the Union Pacific Railroad, have failed to account for many millions of dollars due under that trust to the stockholders of the Credit Mobilier of America, and that the trustees have been guilty of wilful negligence and misconduct in the managements of the trusts.

The 55,000,000 people of the country may congratulate themselves that they can buy the most powerful fever remedy, the drug known as quinine, at $1.25 to $1,35 per ounce. The ring has at last been broken and healthy competitions, as in other things,, has done its good work. It is well known that for many years this drug was subject first to a duty of 45 per cent., and during later years to 20 per cent., which strange as it may seem, gave a virtual monopoly of the market to two great establishments. For years this drug was selling at $3 and $4 an ounce, and so close was the quinine ring kept, that in 1876-77, when the South and Southwest was stricken by epidemic fevers, the scarcity of quinine was such that great distress, and no doubt loss of life, was the result. The profits made by the few great houses that manufactured quinine were enormous, while the duties kept out foreign manufactures.

A passage in Queen Victoria's diary, lately published has created something more than passing interest, in view of certain expressions showing that all the sympathies of her majesty went out to the Germans in the Franco-Prussian war, and that had she possessed the power to direct it, the strength of England would have been thrown into the scale against France, yet she was powerless. Says the queen, apropos of a sermon which she attended at Crathie Church, and which was preached by one of her favored and most favorite pastors: 'Doctor McLeod gave a splendid war sermon. Without mentioning France, he said enough to make every one understand what he meant when he pointed out how God would punish wickedness and vanity and sensuality. The chapters he read were really quite wonderful for the way in which they seemed to describe France.' * * * This passage has stirred bad blood in France, and a feeling of irritation which will continue to rankle in the minds of Frenchmen, and which already finds expression.

A couple of years ago Miss Sallie McLean, a bright Connecticut girl, utilized her observations as a teacher by writing a clever book entitled "Cape Cod Folks," which gave some excellent pictures of the quaint types of character to be found in that corner of New England. Miss McLean was utterly without experience as an author, and was so indiscreet as to use some of the real names of the people whom she described. This naturally provoked their great indignation, and although the publishers changed the names in later editions, one Nightingale, brought suit for damages. The publishers showed that they were free from malice, but the jury, nevertheless, held that they ought to suffer for their negligence and awarded the young man $1,005 as a salve for his wounded feelings. As the publishers testified that the use of the names had already eaten up all the profits of the book, Miss McLean's first venture in authorship was a failure in pecuniary results at least, though she has reaped a rich reward in other respects.

A ball was given by Minister Sargent at Berlin, in honor of Washington's birthday. It was attended by 200 Americans.

Bills will be reported favorable for a public building at La Crosse, Wis., and for a building in Chicago for the use of appraisers.

The remains of Gen. Ord are expected to reach this city on the 27th inst., in which event the funeral will take place on that day.

The house committee on public buildings has agreed to recommend the erection of a public building at Port Townsend, Wash., to cost $57,000.

The election riot investigations in Washington and New Orleans did not develop anything of interest, the testimony being in line with that previously given.

Edward McPherson is allowed admission to the floor of the house, to the surprise of people who do not remember that he was a congressman twenty five years ago.

The postmaster general transmitted to the house a report showing the falsity of the charge that a British spy had tampered with the mails in the New York post office.

Postoffices established: Iowa—Berwick, Polk county; Minnesota, Mosley, Polk county. Postmasters commissioned: Leonard Wagar, Reno, Dak.; Michael Milwerding, Westphalia, Iowa.

Representative G. D. Wise of Virginia will shortly introduce in the house a bill appropriating $3,000 for the completion of the monument to the memory of Mary, mother of Washington.

Mrs. Hunt, wife of the Russian Minister, cables from St. Petersburg to her son in Washington that the illness of Mr. Hunt is possibly fatal. Mr. Hunt, Jr., left Washington the 16th, for St. Petersburg.

Postoffices established: Dakota—Moltke, Burlington county; Trovere, Roberts county. Iowa—Fifield, Marion county; Olds, Henry county. Minnesota—Kragnes, Clay county. Postmasters commissioned—Murlin L. Marshall, Kingsley, Iowa; Halvor G. Homme, Yellow Medicine, Minn.; John P. Watts, Maple Grove, Wis.

There are indications that the house will refuse to make any appropriation for the $1 and $3 greenbacks. As the supply is already exhausted, the treasury will probably this week begin to pay out standard silver dollars to all persons who desire sums smaller than $5, and congressmen will be required to take a portion of their salaries in silver dollars.

A sensation in diplomatic and society circles was caused here over the report that a South American minister to the United States was guilty of wife-whipping. The abused wife is a relative of the late John C. Breckinridge, is a radiant beauty, and ranks high in Washington society. It is said this minister is a very passionate man when dissipating, and his wife is kind and amiable.

A bill that passed the senate provides that any person who, with intent to defraud, shall falsely personate a government officer or employe, or receive any valuable consideration or document by reason of such personation, shall be deemed guilty of felony, and, on conviction, be fined not to exceed $1,000, or imprisonment not to exceed three years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

A bill to forfeit the entire land grant of the Oregon Central, comprising some 2,000,000 acres, was reported to the house on the 20th inst. In its original form the bill included the forfeiture of al lands purchased from the government. Through the efforts, however, of Mr. Strait, it was amended so as to confirm the settlers' titles. It is thought that this just precedent will hereafter prevail in all measures of a like nature.

The senate, Thursday the 21st, in executive session, took up the nomination of George F. Evans as postmaster at Martinsburg, W. Va., and, after an hour's discussion, reached a vote, the result of which was a tie. Thereupon, the senate adjourned without action. It is charged that Evans was present at the lynching of a negro, who had outraged and then murdered a white woman. Evans admitted his presence, but declared he was not a participant in the lynching.

Officers of the army who will be retired this year are Brig. Gen. Wright March 6, Maj. F. Brigman, paymaster, July 10; Col. Henry F. Clark, assistant commissary general, Nov. 9, and Col. John F. Hammond medical department Dec. 7. Col. John Newton will succeed Gen. Wright as chief of engineers. Col. Clarke's retirement will promote Lieut. Col. W. Burns to a colonel, and Maj. George Bell to a lieutenant colonel; on the retirement of Surgeon Hammond, Surgeon Glover will become a colonel, and Major Andrew K. Smith a lieutenant colonel.

A member of the senate committee on public lands says that he was surprised to hear that the impression had been created that the committee would smother the bills received from the house proposing to forfeit the unearned lands granted to several railroads. So far from being true, the senator said, that this report was entirely incorrect, and that the committee would, in all probability, next week report several forfeiture bills. He also said that the committee meetings were developing a disposition on the part of members to include the Northern Pacific among the roads to be deprived of unearned lands.

The annual report of the Washington Monument society was held on the 22d at the residence of Gen. W. McKee Dunn of Washington. The board of officers of the past year was reelected. A stone was accepted for insertion in the monument to represent Wyoming. It was directed that the thanks of the society be tendered, through the secretary of state, to the king of Siam for a stone sent by him for the monument, and a committee of five was appointed to consider the subject of providing for the proper celebration of the completion of the monument, which event is expected to take place early in December next.

The president gave the first of a series of dinners to senators and representatives, Wednesday, the 20th. The state apartments were handsomely decorated. A requisition from the governor of Kentucky for Tom Allen, ex-champion of America, was received by Gov. Crittendon of Missouri on the 20th inst. Allen is wanted in Kentucky for prize fighting, the specific fight being that with Joe Goss, near Covington, Sept. 10, 1876. Allen gave bonds but decamped to England and the bondsmen are now after him.

The body of Salmi Morse, of Passion play notoriety, was found in the Hudson river, he having committed suicide. Morse was a peculiar man; in fact, eccentric, and by many people he was dubbed a "crank." Yet, despite his queer notions, he was looked upon as a reliable and shrewd man, and could, without much effort, secure ample financial backing for any of his enterprises.

News has been received of the lynching of Thomas Wilson (colored) at a point thirty miles north of Little Rock, Ark. Wilson lived near the dwelling of a planter named William Griffy, who was called to a neighboring town on business and remained over night. About midnight the negro entered the house and assaulted Mrs. Griffy. She screamed for assistance and fought him with a fire shovel, driving him from the room.

At Tombstone, Arizona, Thursday 22d John Heith was sentenced to imprisonment for life for complicity in the Bisbee murder. At 8 Friday morning 100 men secured entrance to the jail. Friday afternoon Heith's body was cut down from a telegraph pole where it had dangled all day. Heith took the matter cooly, saying, "Boys you are hanging an innocent man. You will find that out before other men (meaning Dowd and Palo) are hung." While his eyes were being bandaged he said: "I have a favor to ask. Don't mutilate my body by shooting into me after I am hung."

She was very beautiful and accomplished, and a lady well known in Eastern and Southern society, and became famous a few years ago as the reported fiancee of Samuel J. Tilden.

Democratic National Convention.

A meeting of the democratic national committee was held in Chicago on the 22d.

The first thing done which was regarded with special significance was the first ballot on the time for holding the convention. Dates from early in May to the middle of August were proposed, the earlier dates generally being regarded as in the interest of St. Louis, and as these dates were taken up and acted upon, there was corresponding interest on the part of representatives of the rival cities. The first ballot was for the 20th of May, the vote begin 17 to 20. The final vote on the location showed that the vote on this date really indicated the strength of the respective cities of St. Louis and Chicago, the latter getting twenty-one votes for location and the former seventeen. The next ballot on the date fixed it on the 24th of June, but this was changed, after the location was agreed upon, to the 8th of July. Three ballots for the location were taken the last result was Chicago 21, St. Louis 17.

The following call was presented by the executive committee, and agreed upon:

The national Democratic committee, having met in the city of Washington on the 22d of February, 1884, has appointed Tuesday, the 8th day of July next, at noon, as the time, and chosen the city of Chicago as the place, for holding a national Democratic convention. Each state is entitled to representation therein equal to double the number of senators and representatives in congress of the United States. The Democrats of each organized territory and the District of Columbia are entitled to send two delegates, subject to discretion of the convention as to their admission. All Democratic citizens of the United States, irrespective of past political associations and differences, who can unite with us in an effort for a pure, economical and constitutional government, are cordially invited to join in sending delegates to the convention.

The call is signed by all the members of the national Democratic committee. On motion of McHenry of Kentucky, it was resolved that the next meeting of the committee be held at the Palmer house, Chicago, July 7th next. The committee then adjourned.

How a Faribault Lady Was Robbed in Chicago.

A dispatch from Chicago says: The Palmer house was the scene last Monday the 22d, of a remarkable bold assault and roberry. The hotel manager declines to give the name of the lady, at her own request. She is said, however, to be Mrs. Dudley or Mrs. Sykes, a milliner of Faribault, Minn., who arrived in the city early, and after registering at the hotel, went to Gage Bros., and purchased a stock of goods for her business. Returning to the hotel she stopped at a drug store to get a prescription put up. Noticing that she was being watched by a loafer in the ladies' entrance to the hotel, she asked to have the medicine sent to her room, preferring not to expose the sum of money which she had. She then went to her room; a few minutes later, hearing a knock at the door, she opened it to admit, as she supposed, a boy from the drug store. Instead of the boy, she was confronted by the man who had watched her from the ladies' entrance a few moments before. This man seized her by the throat, put a handkerchief saturated with chloroform to her nose, which soon rendered her insensible, and took everything he could lay hands on and left. After a while Mrs Dudley recovered sufficiently to ring the bell and make known her situation. She soon recovered entirely from the assault and has now left the city. Her loss was $400.

The Greenback National Convention.

The following is the official call of the National Greenback Labor party to nominate candidates for president and vice president of the United States, to be voted for at the coming presidential election, will be held in the city of Indianapolis, Ind., on Wednesday, May 28, 1884. A Wisconsin Wedding Scene.

The all-absorbing topic in social circles at Janesville, Wis., is a sensational episode at the wedding of Hiram D. Murdock and Allie B. Gilda Thursday the 21st. During the progress of the festivities the discovery was made that one of the presents, consisting of $50 in gold, which had been given by the groom's uncle, was missing. Great consternation prevailed among the guests, [illegible] Finally to relieve the embarrassment, it was decided to make a search of the guests, which was accordingly done.

Wife Murder in Wisconsin.

A horrible murder and attempt at suicide occurred at Boaz, a small village ten miles from Richland Centre. At 1 o'clock on the 20th B. T. Barnes cut his wife's throat from ear to ear, and made a desperate attempt to kill himself by cutting his own throat. The woman died in a few minutes, but the man is alive and likely to recover. The murderer is one of the leading citizens of the place, and was a farmer. No motive for the deed except despondency over the continued illness of his wife.

MINNESOTA NEWS NOTES.

A Renville County Murderer Arrested.

On Aug. 25, Ole Rogn, Sr., of the town of Wang, Renville county, told his neighbors that his wife, Gertrude O. Rogn, had committed suicide by throwing herself down the well; that he tried to save her, but as he was drawing her up the rope broke, and before he could get another one she was dead. None of the neighbors seemed to doubt her husband's story as to the cause of her death. No inquest was held, as there should have been, the people about there being ignorant of the law, and the woman was buried. A few days ago it had begun to be whispered about that Rogn had murdered his wife. This coming to Rogn's ears he sold his farm and all his personal property, and on the 18th inst., took the train at Sacred Heart for St. Paul. He was arrested at Bird Island by Officer Lewis upon receipt of a telegram from Sheriff H. O. Field.

Rogn used to abuse his wife, and on on the morning of her death he struck her with a stove-lid, cutting a large gash in her arm, knocked her down and kicked her in the head and body, took her by the feet and dragged her about the room. Finally, the woman, dazed and blinded by the blood flowing from the wounds in her face, escaped from his clutches and ran out of the house, her husband after her. Not knowing where she was going, she ran into the open well, which was usually covered with a loose board. Whether Rogn made any effort to get her out is not known by the sheriff. The whole performance was witnessed by Mrs. Anna Lumkum, who was working for Rogn, her eleven-year-old girl, and by four or five others, but strange as it may seem, none of them ever said a word about it until a few days ago. They did not want to get into trouble, and have to go to court as witnesses, is the reason some of them give for not speaking at the time.

Hon. B. Sampson of Crookston, Polk county, has arrived in St. Paul from Washington where he has been for a month past. The object of his trip to Washington was to aid in the passage of a bill ceding the Red Lake Indian reservation. Mr. Sampson says the reservation contains about fifty townsites and is divided about equally between timber and prairie land, the lake being near the center of the reservation. The timber is of a very good quality of pine, oak, and poplar. There are a great many settlers around the reservation who are in need of timber for building and heating purposes, and they cannot afford to ship lumber in as it is too high in price. There is also a demand for prairie land. A petition, with 8,000 signatures attached, praying for the passage of this bill was sent to Washington some time ago and the Minneapolis people were expected to urge its passage, but did not. The bill provides for 160 acres for each Indian, and eighty acres for the children. It also provides for the sale of a part of the timber and the pre-emption of the prarie land. The Indians are very few on the prairie, though there are quite a number in the timber, and most of these would go to the White Earth reservations being occupied by the same tribes. Mr. Sampson says that the secretary of the interior has given his endorsement to the bill.

We devote a great deal of space this week to the report of the committee of ten who interviewed the railroad company in the interests of the valley. We give the report in full to enable our readers to get at the matter from the standpoint of the committee so that they may be enabled to judge of the probable amount of relief to be afforded. That the company feel deeply interested in the matter there can be no doubt and that they wish the farmer to obtain satisfactory prices for his wheat is perfectly plain but that they are fully satisfied that the present system (with one exception that of grading) that the present system is not the best is not so plain. It looks to a man up a tree as though, while they desire to have the farmer obtain every cent there is in his wheat they also desire to throw such protection around the elevator companies now in the field as will insure their handling all or the lion's share of the wheat raised. As the present elevator system affords no competition it is impracticable and can not be done although we can see very much good in the concessions made to the farmers and we believe these concessions are but the preliminary steps which will ultimately lead to a free and open market. If Mr. Hill means that any responsible man may build an elevator from 5,000 bushels up and may handle his wheat the same as any elevator company, send it to Duluth, Minneapolis, Milwaukee or Chicago in bulk, pay what he likes for it and charge the 2½ cents handling charges or not as he likes, we can see wherein this would lead to an open wheat market; but on the other hand if he must agree to pay no more than other elevators and if he must exact the handling charges whether he wishes to or not any number of smaller houses would not change the situation one iota. For instance; sometimes it would be to a merchant's advantage to take a creditor's crop of wheat at a rate of from five to ten cents above the market and deduct handling charges. If the merchant must conform strictly to the rules this would be impracticable and his wheat house would be of no greater benefit to the wheat raiser than any other. We think that farmers should not swallow the whole report at one gulp and sit down and quietly await results but they should perfect their organizations and be ready to take a hand in the matter should events show legislation to be necessary. Some legislation will doubtless be needed and we should be prepared at the proper time to say what that legislation should be to the end that all interests may be served and rash, hasty and unwise legislation prevented.

CROOKSTON, Feb. 21st, 1884.

Friend Cooke.

DEAR SIR:—I hand you herewith correspondence which will explain itself would state however that the party who raised the wheat has a large quantity of it on hand, and as he was owing some notes to Mr. Deering which were past due, he brought to Mr. Thayer, collecting agent for Deering, the sample of wheat spoken of in the letters and said that 40 cents was the best offer he could get for it and asked to have his paper extended, Mr. Thayer having satisfied himself that 40 cents was the best that could be got for the wheat in this county extended the paper and took the sample and sent it to Spring Valley with the result indicated; it is all very well to accuse the farmers of improvidence in running in debt; where is the justice or the moral right in taking advantage of them to rob them of 35 cents per bushels on their wheat crops because they have contracted a small debt which in many instances they must pay when their crop comes into market in this instance the farmer was fortunate enough to get extension. But how many of the farmers of the valley have had to submit to the robbery because their creditors could not extend their credit.

Very truly,

JOHN N. IVES.

J. N. Ives Esq., Crookston.

DEAR SIR—According to your request I hand you a copy of the letter I sent Messrs. Graling & Brass, Spring Valley, Minn., with the sample of wheat I brought from Fisher. They are gentleman of long experience as grain dealers, and their judgment is reliable.

Your truly, H. B. THAYER.

CROOKSTON, Minn., Feb. 8th, 1884.

Brass & Graling, Spring Valley.

GENTLEMEN:—I send you a small sample of wheat raised in Polk County, near Fisher. This wheat is graded by the Millers' Association buyer at Fisher, and bought by them, if bought at all, for 40 cents per bushel. Of course the sample is small for you to judge from. But I would like you to examine it carefully and tell me what wheat like this would be worth at the Spring Valley market. Please write at Minneapolis, and oblige yours truly.

H. B. THAYER.

SPRING VALLEY, Feb. 13th, 1884.

H. B. Thayer,

DEAR SIR:—Your letter and sample of wheat received the wheat will grade No. 2 when cleaned and is worth 75 cents in this market.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., Feb. 12, 1884.

Hon. H. Steenerson, Crookston, Minn.

DEAR SIR: Your favor of the 8th inst. enclosing copy of resolutions passed at a citizens' meeting at City Hall in your city, relating to opposition to Mr. Nelson's Red Lake Reservation bill, was received to-day. Mr. Nelson handed me a copy of his bill as reported to the House, for my examination, requesting me also to introduce the bill in the Senate, and I am examining the bill with reference to a compliance with his request. From the examination I have thus far been able to give it it seems to me to contain all the necessary regulations to protect both the settlers and the Government. I desire further to confer with the Secretary of the Interior upon the subject and also with Mr. Nelson briefly in regard to the bill. I will then if nothing occurs to change my views in regard to it introduce the bill in the Senate and ask its reference to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Very respectfully and truly yours.

S. J. R. McMILLAN.

OUR CHICAGO LETTER.

CHICAGO, Feb. 23d, 1884.

The last official report of the visible supply of the grain "in sight" in the United States and Canada in round numbers was fifty-five million bushels. Of this vast amount twenty-three million bushels is in the elevators and vessels in Chicago. One year ago Chicago held only twelve million bushels. What a vast amount of wealth is represented in this grain. Estimating the value at 80 cents per bushel, which, considering that three-fifths of it is wheat, is below the truth if anything, the country has $44,000,000 invested in grain to-day which is lying idle in the store-houses; and this makes no account of the grain still in the hands of farmers.

After a bitter fight, the saloon element has been obliged to acquiesce in the Harper high license law, at least to a partial extent. The city Government refused to enforce it on the ground that it was not legally passed. The Citizens' League prosecuted one of the saloon men, the supreme court sustaining the law, and now the city council has passed an ordinance fixing licenses at $150 for the sale of malt and $500 for spirituous liquors. Before the ordinance passed, there were public boasts made by saloon keepers that they would take out a beer license and then sell whiskey. So far as the city authorities are concerned they will no doubt be able to do so, but unfortunately for them this same citizens' league proposes to see that the law is enforced and it will be backed by the better element among the dealers themselves who will take out the $500 license and naturally will object to others selling whisky under the low one.

While the radical element among the temperence peopl look upon this fight with indifference the more moderate ones, moderate in the sense that while they seek to attain the same end as the others, are willing to approach it by a series of steps if it cannot be reached at a single bound, are very jubilant and look upon the victory as one of the greatest ever won for the cause in this hot-bed of infamy.

The ministers of the city are considering means of promoting the observance of the Sabbath, at least of preventing its desecration, as by the keeping open of theatres for instances. The various denominations appointed representives to a general committee. One meeting has been held but nothing definite arrived at, and another will be called soon. I expect little will be accomplished except in the way of moral suasion. The subject is a serious one. All of our theatres are open every Sunday. In one of them religious services are held in the morning and a theatrical performance in the evening. In one of the leading theatres a German company holds forth each Sabbath night, but most of the troops now traveling about the country give a regular performance on Sunday evening when this city is reached. Sunday is a favorite day for parades by various societies and by many working mens organization. Nearly all labor organizations seek to economize time by holding their meetings on that day. If church-going people are entitled to respect in worshipping according to the dictates of their consciences these things should be stopped, for they do most seriously interfere with worship as usually conducted—a religious service cannot be carried on successfully with brass bands in full blast on the street.

The scandal about the Custom House is a regular Banquo's Ghost—it will not down. Just now a Government architect is here making an inspection. He has but just entered upon his work, but says it is clear there must be a special appropriation to put the building in proper shape. This white elephant has already cost six and a half millions, and now the problem is to keep it from tumbling down. The magnitude of the structure may be imagined when I tell you that the hot water pipes by which it is heated if laid in a continuous line would reach forty-two miles. The cost of the ground upon which it stands was one and a quarter millions, the balance of the cost went into stone, iron and the pockets of the contractors.

Referring to public buildings, there is much ill feeling among the mechanics of the city over the prospect of the employment of convict labor to do the marble and tile work of the new City Hall. The lowest bid is that of a company employing such labor and is $52,445. and under the law the commissioners must give them the job. The next lowest bid by a firm proposing to do the work with "free" labor, is $54,450. A meeting of mechanics is called for next Sunday with view to raising the difference between these two bids. $2,005, to be turned over to the county on condition that the job be given the "free" labor man. I suspect there will be a chance for a suit for damages if this plan is carried out.

Red Hogs.—Their Standard and Future.

The breeders of red hogs have organized an association, uniting the New Jersey family, called "Jersey Reds," and those of New York, known as "Durocs." The latter have been mostly bred in Saratoga county, though quite common in Washington and Renasslaer counties. The name agreed upon is Duroc-Jersey, which unites all interests, giving a foundation broad enough for all concerned. The following standard adopted, is more for the typical hog than a representation of the red hogs as they are now generally bred. The true Duroc-Jersey hog should be long, quite deep bodied, not round, but broad on the back, and holding the width well out to the hips and hams; the head small, compared with the body; the cheek broad and full, with considerable breadth between the eyes; bone, not fine nor yet coarse, but medium. The legs should be medium in size and length, but set well under the body and well apart, and not cut up high in the flank or above the knee. The hams should be broad, full, and well down to the hock. The neck should be short and thick, the face slightly curved, with nose short, the ear rather large and lapped over the eyes; the tail thick at the beginning, and tapering to a point. A growth of hair of medium fineness, usually straight, but in some cases a little wavy, with few if any bristles at the top of the shoulders. Color red, varying from cherry red, or even brownish to light yellowish red, with occasionally a small fleck on belly and legs. The darker shades of red, without the black flecks, is the type most desirable Disposition gentle. When full grown, should dress from four hundred to five hundred pounds; pigs nine months old should dress two hundred and fifty to three hundred pounds.

It will not take long to bring the Duroc-Jerseys up to this standard, and when it is done they will go to the front and stay there, as one of the most profitable breeds. The crossing of the two families together with the united blood already in them, will give them stamina for years, and prevent the "running out," which always follws inbreeding, and too long continuous breeding in a direct line. There is room for this breed, which can now under the care of the association be improved, and also be made thoroughbreds. There has been a great deal of loose and mixed breeding of red hogs, which has given them a set-back where specimens have been introduced, as people seeing them supposed they were true types. The Duroc-Jersey hogs are in the hands of men of character and experience, who will unite their skill and experience to perfect the breed, and to push it well to the front.—COL. F. D. CURTIS, in American Agriculturist for March.

A Home Bar.

Liquor dealers pay an average of $2.00 a gallon for whiskey. One gallon contains an average of sixty-five drinks, and at ten cents a drink, the poor man pays $6.50 to the man for handing it over the bar, to say nothing about the water added. In other words, he pays $2 for the whiskey and $4.50 to the man for handing it over the bar. Now, if you must drink, make your wife your bar-keeper. Lend her $2 to buy a gallon of whiskey for a beginning, and every time you want a drink go to her and pay her ten cents for it. If she waters it 25 per cent., which will be none the worse for you, by the time you have drank a gallon she will have $7.12, or enough to refund the $2 that she borrowed of you and pay for another gallon of whiskey and have a balance of $5.12. She will be able to conduct further operations on her own capital, and when you become an inebriate, unable to support yourself, shunned and despised by all respectable persons, your wife will have money enough to keep you until you get ready to fill a drunkard's grave.—Selected.

American Agriculturist for March, 1884 is a grand number of this sterling Farm Journal. Every page is filled with valuable hints and suggestions, made more impressive by neat explanatory engravings. There are 67 columns of editorial matter, including 125 seasonable subjects, and 120 illustrations. The full-page engraving "Thrifty and Thriftless," enforces an important truth in rural economy. "A Southern Planter's Home," "Prize shorthorn Cow," "Jersey-Duroc Pig," "Huckleberries," "Out of the Waters," and "Fishing for Sponges," are among the large engravings. Good Stanchions, Farm Fences, Chicken Coops, Complete Piggery, Duck Houses, Fish Trap, Barberries, Carnations, Plant Stand and Remodelled Barn, are also fully illustrated. How to Sow Wheat.

FRAZEE CITY, Minn., Feb. 16, 1884.

Correspondent Fargo Republican.

One of your correspondents asks about harrowing wheat after it is three or four inches high, to kill weeds,

I can tell him a trick worth two of that, and that is to harrow his ground well before seeding, and after seeding, again enough times to complete a good job of farming. After a few days, when it has settled, if by rain the better, than harrow again that will kill and destroy most all the weeds that have sprouted and started to grow sooner than the wheat, because they have been frozen and soaked all winter ready to sprout and grow as soon as the soil is warmed and stirred up. Just about this time the wheat is ready to commence growing and gets an even start with what weeds are left, with the chances in favor of the wheat choking down or holding its own over the weeds.

With this plan or management, it will not be so common to see a field green and matted with weeds at the time the grain is coming up. The frequent use of a light fine tooth harrow is the best implement on the farm to do good, nice, clean farming with.

Every weed that you kill or destroy gives room for a stool or stalk of grain to grow in the place of it. You cannot grow a full and perfect crop of grain with a mass or mat of weeds at the roots.

Do not be afraid to harrow to perfect or finish a field, that from press of other work or accident of weather the wheat has got sprouted and rooted one-half inch or so, for if you will get down and dig around with your fingers you will find them simply moved aside into a nice warm bed of fresh soil, and they will grow all the better from the change and cultivation.

Yours truly, D. L. W.

WHITE EARTH AGENCY, Minn.
February 14th, 1884.

Sealed proposals for the sale of dead and fallen logs cut by the Indians on Red Lake and White Earth Indian Reservations will be received at this Agency until Monday the 24th day of March 1884 at 12 o'clock noon at which time the bids will be opened. The logs located at the following points on

Red Lake Reservation.

About 400,000 feet in 2 camps located on Clearwater Lake. About 600,000 feet in 3 camps located on Clearwater River below Clearwater Lake. About 150,000 feet in 1 camp located on "Four Legged Lake" River about 5 miles from junction of the Clearwater River. About 600,000 feet logs in 3 camps located on Sandy River about 3 miles from the outlet of Red Lake. About 200,000 feet logs in 1 camp located on Red Lake about 10 miles from outlet. About 200,000 feet logs in 1 camp located on Red Lake about 10 miles from outlet.

White Earth Reservation.

About one million feet logs located on Clearwater River about 6 miles from its source. About one million feet logs located on "Walker's Brook" a tributary of Clearwater River.

The terms of this sale is, that all bids must be accompanied with a certified check upon some reliable bank for at least one dollar ($1.00) per thousand feet as an assurance of good faith, the same to be returned to the unsuccessful bidder or bidders depositing the same when the bids are opened.

These logs to be scaled by the State surveyor whose measurement shall be considered final. Twenty-five (25) per cent of the [illegible] of the logs purchased will be required to be paid in to me within ten (10) days from the acceptance of the bid [illegible] and the remainder within thirty (30) days.

The Agent claims the right to reject any or all bids as many seem best for the parties for whom the logs are sold. Mark on outside envelope "bid for logs."

C. P. LUSE,
U. S. Indian Agent.

STATE OF MINNESOTA, County of Polk, ss. In Probate Court.

In the matter of the estate of Alexander Grant, deceased:

On reading and filing the petition of W. D. Raymond, of Polk County, Minnesota, representing among other things, that Alexander Grant, late of Polk County, Minnesota, on the 15th day of March 1884, at the city of Crookston, in said county, died intestate, and being a resident of this county at the time of his death, leaving goods, chattels and estate within this county, and that the said petitioner is a friend of said deceased, and praying that administration of said estate be to John B. McLaren, granted.

It is ordered that said petition be heard before the Judge of this Court, on Wednesday, the 26th day of March, 1884, at 10 o'clock a. m., at the Probate Office in Crookston, in said county.

Ordered further, that notice thereof be given to the heirs of said deceased, and to all persons interested, by publishing a copy of this order for three successive weeks prior to said day of hearing, in the POLK COUNTY JOURNAL, a weekly newspaper printed and published at the city of Crookston, in said county.

Dated at Crookston, the 12th day of February, 1884.

By the Court: ROBERT J. MONTAGUE.
Judge of Probate.

MORTGAGE SALE.

DEFAULT HAVING BEEN MADE IN THE payment of the sum of two hundred and thirty-seven dollars, (237.00,) which is claimed to be due at the date of this notice upon a certain mortgage, duly executed and delivered by Gideon Derosier a single man, to Charles H. Minor, of Racine, Wisconsin, bearing date the 30th day of March, A. D. 1882, and, with a power of sale therein contained, duly recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds in and for the County of Polk and State of Minnesota, on the 30th day of March A. D. 1882, at 4 o'clock p. m., in book "F" of mortgages, on pages 258 and 299, in the sum of two hundred dollars, to secure the payment of one certain promissory note for said sum of two hundred dollars, payable on the 30th day of March 1885, with interest thereon at the rate of ten per cent. per annum, payable on the first day of January of each year until paid, and containing a clause that if default be made in the payment of any interest, or any portion thereof for the space of ten days after the same becomes payable, then all said principal and interest, shall at the option of the holder thereof become immediately due and payable, without further notice, and whereas two installments of interest amounting to thirty-seven dollars has been due and payable for more than ten days, and no action or proceeding having been instituted, at law or otherwise, to recover the debt secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof or said installments of interest.

Now therefore, notice is hereby given, that by virtue of the power of sale contained in said mortgage, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the premises described in and conveyed by said mortgage, viz; The northeast quarter (ne¼) of Section No. twenty-two (22,) in Township No. one hundred and fifty-one (151,) north, of Range No. forty-six (46) west, of the 5 P. M., containing one hundred and sixty acres more or less, according to the United States Government survey thereof and situated in Polk County and State of Minnesota, with the hereditaments and appurtenances; which sale will be made by the Sheriff of said Polk County, at the front door of the Court House in the City of Crookston, in the said County and State, on the 6th day of March A. D. 1884, at ten o'clock a. m., of that day, at public vendue, to the highest bidder for cash, to pay said debt and interest, and the taxes, if any, on said premises, and twenty-five dollars attorney's fees as stipulated in and by said mortgage in case of foreclosure, and the disbursements allowed by law; subject to redemption at any time within one year from the day of sale, as provided by law.

Dated January 16th A. D. 1884.

CHARLES H. MINOR,
Mortgagee.

DAVIS BROWER, Att'y for Mortgagee.

[35-41]

STATE OF MINNESOTA, County of Polk, ss. District Court, Eleventh Judicial District.

Notice is hereby given that by virtue of an execution to me directed and delivered and now in my hands, issued out of the District Court of the Eleventh Judicial District, State of Minnesota, County of Polk, upon a judgment rendered in said Court in favor Between Ernest Buse, plaintiff, and Mary R. Bottineau, and John B. Bottineau, defendants, in favor of said Ernest Buse.

I have levied upon the following described lands situated in the County of Polk and State of Minnesota, to-wit: One undivided one-third (⅓) of lots eight (8) nine (9) ten (10) eleven (11) and twelve (12) of Section fifteen (15); also the northwest quarter of section twenty-two (22) and lots two (2) and eight (8) of Section fourteen (14) and lots three (3) four (4) five (5) six (6) and thirteen (13) in Section fifteen (15); also the southwest quarter of the southeast quarter and the north half of the southeast quarter of Section twenty-two, (22) and the northwest quarter of the southwest quarter of Section twenty-three, (23) all in township one hundred and fifty one (151) north, of range forty-four (44) west; and lots seven (7) eight (8) nine (9) ten (10) eleven (11) in Section twenty-six (26) Township one hundred and fifty-one (151) north, of range forty-five (45) west; also lots five (5) six (6) seven (7) eight (8) nine (9) ten (10) eleven (11) and twelve (12) in Section eighteen (18); also lots one (1), two (2) three (3) six (6) and twelve (12), and the southwest quarter of the northeast quarter, and lots eight (8) nine (9) ten (10) eleven (11), and the southwest quarter of the southwest quarter of Section eight (8); also lots three (3) four (4) five (5) six (6) seven (7) and eight (8) of Section four, (4) Township one hundred and fifty (150) north, of Range forty-five (45) west, containing in the whole of said tract fourteen hundred and forty (1,440) acres, more or less, according to the government survey.

And that I shall, on Wednesday, the ninth (9th) day of April, A. D 1884, at the hour of ten o'clock a. m. of said day, at the front door of the Court House in said County and State proceed to sell all the right, title and interest of the above named Mary R. Bottineau and John B. Bottineau in and to the above described property to satisfy said judgment and costs amounting to (nine hundred and fifty-three 28-100 dollars $953 28-100) together with all accruing costs of sale and interest on the same from January 26th, 1884, at the rate fo seven (7) per cent. per annum, at public auction to the highest bidder for cash.

W. F. ZWICKEY,
Sheriff of Polk County.

Dated Crookston, Minn., January 31, A. D. 1884. [41 47]

WHEREAS, DEFAULT HAS BEEN MADE in the conditions of a certain mortgage executed and delivered by Henry S. Begemon and Amelia S. Begemon his wife as mortgagers, to Henry Hammel mortgagee, dated the 21st day of March A. D. eighteen hundred and eighty-two and recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds, of the County of Polk, in the State of Minnesota, on the seventh day of April A. D. 1882, a nine o'clock and forty-five minutes a. m., in book "G" of mortgages, on pages 353, 354 and 355, on which there is claimed to be due, at the date of this notice, the amount of sixty-seven dollars and fifty cents with interest thereon at the rate of ten per cent. per annum from the twenty first day of March A D, 1882, and no action or proceedings has been instituted at law or in equity to recover the debt secured by said mortgage or any part thereof.

Now, notice is hereby given, that by virtue of a power of sale contained in said mortgage, and of the statute in such case made and provided, said mortgage will be foreclosed by sale of the mortgaged premises therein described, at public auction at the front door of the court house, in the city of Crookston, in the County of Polk, and State of Minnesota, on Saturday the eighth (8th) day of March A. D. eighteen hundred and eighty-four at two o'clock in the afternoon, to satisfy the amount which shall then be due on said mortgage, with the interest thereon, and costs and expenses of sale, and twenty-five dollars attorney's fees, as stipulated in said mortgage in case of foreclosure.

The premises described in said mortgage, and so to be sold, are the lots, pieces or parcels, of land situated in the County of Polk, and State of Minnesota, and known and described as follows, to-wit; Southeast quarter (se¼) of section four (4) in township one hundred and fifty-one, (151) north, of range number forty-four (44) west of 5th principal meridian, according to government survey thereof.

MORTGAGE SALE.

WHEREAS, DEFAULT HAS BEEN MADE in the conditions of a certain mortgage executed and delivered by Henry S. Begemon and Emelia Begemon his wife mortgagors, to Henry Hammel mortgagee, dated the thirteenth day of March, A. D. eighteen hundred and eighty-two and recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds, of the County of Polk, in the State of Minnesota, on the fifteenth day of March A. D. 1882, at ten o'clock and five minutes a. m., in book "B" of mortgages, on page 640 on which there is claimed to be due, at the date of this notice, the amount of two hundred and forty-five dollars and interest thereon at the rate of ten per cent. per annum from the 13th day of March A. D. 1882, and no action or proceeding has been instituted at law or in equity to recover the debt secured by said mortgage or any part thereof.

Now, notice is hereby given, that by virtue of a power of sale contained in said mortgage, and of the statute in such case made and provided, said mortgage will be foreclosed by sale of the mortgaged premises therein described at public auction at the front door of the Court House in the City of Crookston, in the County of Polk, and State of Minnesota, on Saturday the eighth (8th) day of March A. D. eighteen hundred and eighty-four, at two o'clock in the afternoon, to satisfy the amount which shall then be due on said mortgage, with the interest thereon, and costs and expenses of sale, and twenty-five dollars attorney's fees, as stipulated in said mortgage in case of foreclosure.

The premises described in said mortgage, and so to be sold, are the lot, piece or parcel of land situated in the County of Polk, and State of Minnesota, and known and described as follows, to wit: The southeast quarter (¼) of section number four (4) in township number one hundred and fifty-one (151) north, of range number forty-four (44) west, of 5th principal meridian, containing 160 acres of land.

MORTGAGE SALE.

DEFAULT HAVING BEEN MADE IN THE payment of the sum of five hundred and twenty-eight and forty-nine one hundredths dollars, (528 49-100,) which is claimed to be due at the date of this notice upon a certain mortgage duly executed and delivered by Carrie Dewey and Alvah Dewey her husband to E. D. Childs bearing date the 11th day of June A. D. 1883, and, with a power of sale therein contained, duly recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds in and for the County of Polk, and State of Minnesota, on the 19th day of June A. D. 1883, at 3 o'clock p. m., in book "N" of mortgages, on page 60, to secure the payment of a certain promissory note for the sum of five hundred dollars payable September 14th, 1883, with interest at the rate of ten per cent. per annum until paid, and duly executed and delivered by said Carrie Dewey and Alvah Dewey her husband, and no action or proceeding having been instituted, at law or otherwise, to recover the debt secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof, or the interest thereof.

Now therefore, notice is hereby given, that by virtue of the power of sale contained in said mortgage, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the premises described in and conveyed by said mortgage, viz: Lot eight and nine (8 and 9) in block five (5) and the east half of lot twenty-two (22) in block two (all situate in the village of Fisher) according to the original plat thereof on file in the office of the Register of Deeds, in and for said Polk County, and State of Minnesota, with the hereditaments and appurtenances; which sale will be made by the sheriff of said Polk County at the front door of the Court House, in the city of Crookston, in said County, and State on the 29th day of March A. D. 1884, at o'clock a. m., of that day, at public vendue, the highest bidder for cash, to pay said debt and interest, and the taxes, if any, on said premises, and twenty-five dollars attorney fees as stipulated in and by said mortgage in case of foreclosure, and the disbursements allowed by law; subject to redemption at any time within one year from the day of sale as provided by law.

Dated February 7th, A. D 1884.

Grand Forks Daily Plaindealer.

Walker, of whom so much has been said about in reference to pine logs, has just returned from Washington, where he has been endeavoring to defeat the Nelson Pine Land Bill. He says the bill has no chance whatsoever of passing. He thinks it should not pass. It is quite well known that he owns pretty much all the pine timber outside of the reservation. If he can prevent the reservation pine from coming on the market, he can continue to choke fabulous prices for timber down our necks. The northwest cares little for Walker's opinion in the matter. He would undoubtedly remain of the same opinion until all his pine was sold and then he would think it a burning outrage and a shame if it (congress) would not open it up next day.

In opposing this bill Walker has opposed the interest of every individual in this valley except his own. He has placed his desire to pile up another million in juxtaposition with hundreds and hundreds of poor settlers, who have scarcely enough to buy their claim shanties. It matters not to him whether the emigrants, settlers or farmers have sufficient to supply the absolute necessaries or not. If he could keep a monopoly on the pine we all have to have, he would let them live on one meal a day if it would subserve his own interest.

Such a total disregard to the interest of an already long-suffering public, such a total obliteration of the instincts and impulses of humanity, such an absolute uncontrollable love of one's own interest to the exclusion of all others, even the appeal of the poor, suffering and distressed, may be American, but is more likely to be set down as Barbarian.

There can be no objection urged against capital fighting capital in commercial life, on boards of trade, exchanges, or even in law-making bodies; but when it undertakes to contest in the latter body the rights and interest of men who have not had time to get on their feet and who are earnestly fighting for a scanty living, it argues such a depravity of purpose and baseness of motive that total political and social ostracism is none too good for its possessor.

If it be true that the Nelson pine land bill has no chance to become a law this session and that Mr. Walker has in any way canvassed or aided its defeat, we size up human nature erringly if this northwest has any further use for him.

There must be some mistake about that business, Mr. Plaindealer. It would seem by what the Hon. B. Sampson says, that Mr. T. B. Walker only objected to the matter of time on that bill and after that was satisfactorily ljusted, withdrew his objections. His rother, however, Col. Plat B. Walker, pposed the bill in to to and did all he ould to kill it.

THE HUDSON BAY.

he Harbors Sufficient to Shelter the Largest Navies of the World.

om a Lecture by Adrian Nelson.

This brings us to the next step in the heme. The promoters, by careful exrations for a period of some three ars having refuted the statement that country was of the roughest nature, e next confronted by a further statent in regard to the ports. It was no ger possible to hide the fact that both Churchill and Port Nelson were h capable of sheltering the largest ies in the world, so stories of thick which broke up with the floods of ling snow in the spring, jamming and ashing all before it were advanced. parisons were also made with Archl in Russia, which being in latitude 0 is some 860 miles further north open for only four months of the [illegible] not sufficient to prevent a steamer entering at any time, but might in spring impede a sailing vessel contending with floating ice. La Perouse entered it with a French man-of-war in 1782, experiencing no difficulty although a stranger and an enemy. Though this is some evidence in favor of the port, and although the Hudson's Bay Company's ships have been in and out a hundred times, as it is one of the first ports that they made use of, yet the fact that this fall the Hudson's Bay Company's vessel Sea Nymph was frozen in there, has been advanced as a reason for rejecting the port and the whole scheme. When at York Factory I was on board this ship and the impression left on my mind is one of astonishment that a company of prominent merchants, members of the greatest nation of sailors the world ever saw, should continue to risk their property and the lives of their servants in such an old fashioned and venerable craft. It is one of those extraordinary anomalies which England alone can produce, and it is only fit to be associated with these extremes of poverty and wealth, ignorance and knowledge which are so common there. Conceive this old fashioned craft, helpless without a strong fair wind, frozen in by half an inch of ice late in the month of October, held up as a warning and example to our Atlantic steamers which every week, all the year round, perform voyages in seven and eight days which it takes this old sailor seven or eight or even ten weeks to accomplish, and that during the most favored time of the year. The very fact that the Ocean Nymph was able to leave York Factory and sail to Port Churchill as late in the year, should be accepted as most telling evidence in favor of the navigation of the Hudson Bay. This, however, is only the second time during the whole course of the Hudson's Bay Company's existence that their ship has been frozen in it having happened once before in the James Bay.—[Emerson International.

A Curious Case.

Grand Forks Plaindealer.

A Milwaukee telegram of Feb. 22d, says: "Little Mike" Mendelson, the East Water street clothier who failed about three months ago, is in an exceedingly queer position. It appears that some time before his failure Mendelson made a homestead entry in Dakota. The land he selected proved very good property and he made considerable improvements upon it, so that now it is quite valuable. The homestead law expressly provides that a person making an entry under the act must thereafter reside upon the land entered, and the law of Wisconsin as strongly lays down the rule that in order for a business man to make a valid assignment for the benefit of his creditors, he must be a resident of the State. When Mendelson made his assignment he was supposed to be a resident of Dakota, but was really living in this city together with his family. Those of his creditors who sought to invalidate the assignment claimed that as Mendelson had made a homestead entry in Dakota, he was legally a resident of that territory, and not of Wisconsin, and that his assignment was therefore void. To counteract this claim Mendelson affirmed on oath that he was a legal resident of Wisconsin. The result was entirely unforseen. A person in Dakota hearing of the matter, jumped Mendelson's claim there and proposes to hold it too, claiming that Mendelson has abandoned it and become a resident of this State.

Farmers' Grievance.

Douglas County News.

The POLK COUNTY JOURNAL publishes our article on "Farmers' Grievances" and says we do not fully grasp the situation, which may be true. We are ready at all times to receive light on any subject that we are in the dark about. What we intended to convey was: That the great trouble in matters of this kind was, that the farmers in their pursuit after some remedy for this existing evil would lose sight of the main object, and would seek for relief in legislative enactments alone instead of trying to lift themselves out of the mire by raising something else besides wheat. For it is a lamentable fact that the farmers of the Northwest are wild upon this subject. Supposing the wheat crop last year had been a total failure, how many of them in Dakota and Minnesota had any other means than what they received for their wheat to meet the obligations that were coming due, for a great many of them are laboring under the irritating effect of a plaster commonly called a mortgage, and if their only resource had been denied them by an almighty power they would have seen the labor of years swept away in a night and themselves homeless and powerless to prevent it.

That the farmers have been swindled there is no doubt, and by a gigantic monopoly that has its hands on their throats at all times, and we have no [illegible]

A Monopolist's View.

Grand Forks Herald.

In the news column of the Herald yesterday, appeared a brief statement of the views which Mr. Walker the lumber speculator entertains of Congressman Nelson's Pine Land Bill. The ill-natured feature of his criticism upon that measure, which is not only asked for by nine-tenths of the people of the Northwest, but comes into Congress endorsed by Sec'y. Teller, shows that Walker is chafing under disappointment and does not speak what he believes, when he says that there is no chance for the passage of that bill. The coloring given to his remarks by the Minneapolis flunkey, is another indication that the whole thing is intended only to discourage the business men of the Northwest in their earnest effort to secure the passage of a just law, which will not rob the Indians of a dollar, nor deprive them of a single privilege they now enjoy, while, on the other hand it would not only be beneficial to the Indians themselves but to the entire Northwest. Of course, Mr. Walker and all the other avaricious little souls, who dance attendance to the Minneapolis pine land ring, don't like Hon. Nelson nor his pine land bill, and for the reason that it destroys monopoly at the start and prevents speculation by just such sleuth-hounds as are always sniffing about government tracts for a job to hunt down the innocent hare snoozing in the brush heap. Mr. Walker is one of the timber demons of the times. Before his like, mountains are denuded ruthlessly, and summer drouths and spring freshets bearing down everything in their irresistible sweep, come in the wake of their destroying course. The unreasoning lust of gold and ambition to grab it all in a few short years of worthless life, which have characterized the Walker's of the east, are the principal elements in the annual spectacle of overflown valleys, villages and cities. Against this ruthless rapacity the government must raise its strong arm where it may. And that is the feature of the Nelson bill which sorely bothers the destroying lumber speculators. The stumpage is to be sold under restrictions, and only a certain per centage to be cut each year. The idea is to give a fair distribution of the wealth of timber on the reservation and to preserve the young and growing timber from ring Vandalism which either cuts down or burns all it can not carry off. The government rightly proposes to encourage timber growing to a purpose, while it regulates the supply now fit for saw-lumber, so as to benefit the citizens most needing it, not for speculative, but for legitimate building purposes. It is more than likely that the Congressmen and other officials seen by Mr. Walker in his maiden effort at lobbying, told him so, and that his moroseness is due to the fading view of another monster grab of timber land such have in the past disgraced the disposal of the government's wooded possessions. But Mr. Walker had better kept his tent and not open fire so soon. If, as he claims, the government is about to go back on itself to especially accommodate Mr. Walker and the Minneapolis timber thieves, and if Mr. Nelson and Secretary Teller's efforts to deal honestly in this matter with both whites and Indians are such ridiculous ones, then why did he not pursue the oyster policy, when the flunky press agent struck him as an object of interview? The fact is, Mr. Walker was not in a good laughing humor and that may be attributed either to ill-success or whisky at Washington, both or other.

IMPORTANT MOVEMENT.

The St. Paul & Manitoba R. R. Reduces Rates and Offers Land at $3 per Acre.

St. Paul Globe: The St. Paul & Manitoba railroad announces to-day an important reduction in rates which will take effect on the 1st of March. They have decided to reduce second class and emigrant passenger rate twenty per cent, and also to make substantially the same reduction in all of their freight rates. In keeping with this important reduction this company have made a still more important movement. They now offer all of their land north of their Northern Pacific crossings at Glyndon and Fargo, for the uniform prices of three dollars per acre. Even at this low rate it is sold on time and only fifty cents per acre is required as the cash payment. Heretofore the price has been $6 and $7 with a rebate for each acre broken [illegible] own) for the Farmers' Tribune, a package of the seed of the remarkable Imperial Tree Bean with a choice selection of other garden seeds of the full list value of $1.00 will be sent free. The subscription price is only $1.15. The Minneapolis Farmers' Tribune has taken a high rank among weekly papers in this country. It has no equal in the Northwest as a general family newspaper. It is a clean, hightoned, fearless exponent of Republican principles. In this year of great political contests it will afford all the news. The veteran journalist, Col. John H. Stevens, is the agricultural editor; Col. R. P. McGlincy, Secretary of the Northwestern Dairymen's Association is the editor of the Dairy Department and Dr. E. A. A. Grange is editor of the Veterinary column. The Home Circle, with the distinguished Miss Juliet Corson as special editor, is invaluable, while Our Young Folks' Columns are bright with attractive, pure and instructive literature and stories. Farm Notes.

Profit in Pig Feeding.

Something more than mere stuffing with food is required, if rearing and fattening of pigs is to be made desirable. Food and labor are becoming more costly every year, and to make this important industry profitable, there must be corresponding reduction in losses, to be secured by more economic surroundings, and making a little of the more expensive food go as far as possible in making flesh. The first requisite is comfort, as without this no animal will thrive well. Let it be well understood, that cold and filth are destructive to success. Arrangements to save labor are of increasing importance as above noted. As to food, one kind only of concentrated diet, without change, will break down any young pig's stomach, and produce a feverish state in an older one; it is unnatural for an animal naturally constituted to eat everything. Concentrated rich food needs a combination with coarser kinds, to render it less compact and allow a more ready penetration of the gastric juices. How can healthy action be maintained, if the intestines of the animal contain only a mass of fermenting, putrefying stuff? I never had autumn dropped pigs grow so fast, or show so healthy a condition as two lots of different breeds fed this winter on buckwheat bran. They are in a warm pig house, where it seldom freezes; the coarser part of the flour left on the hulls supplies food for the stomach, and the hulls keep the intestines in a healthy condition. Few farmers think of this latter point, and confine their pigs to clear corn meal, the most heating and unhealthful of all the cereals. Corn is the great staple food for hogs, and will continue to be, but it should be utilized to the best advantage by judicious combination with coarser food, for swine as well as for men, and for breeding as well as growing and fattening animals. A feed once a day to fattening hogs of carrots or beets, increases the appetite, gives tone to the stomach, and has a cooling effect upon it. More roots, or other cheap succulent food is required. —American Agriculturist for March.

The Sunflower as an Oil Plant.

Inquiries have recently been made of us concerning the cultivation of the Sunflower on a large scale for the sake of the oil contained in its seeds. The sunflower as an oil plant is sparingly cultivated in France, and to a greater extent in Southern Russia. In this country, aside from Castor Oil and Linseed very little has been done in cultivating oil-bearing plants. We have now less need of cultivating them than formerly, as the products of petroleum afford a wonderfully cheap illuminating oil, while oil for other uses is obtained cheaply from cotton seeds, formerly a waste product. Abroad the sunflower is not regarded with much favor as an oil-bearing plant, as the yield is only about fifteen per cent. of the weight of the seeds, while cotton seed (hulled) yields fifty per cent. The ashes of the sunflower stem contain a very large amount of potash, showing that the crop draws very heavily upon the soil for one of its most valuable plant constituents and would soon impoverish it.—American Agriculturist for March.

Where do Sponges Come from?

There are a great number of different kinds of sponges besides those of the shops, and some are to be found in nearly every sea, though they have so little resemblance to what you ordinarily see that you would hardly suppose them to be related. The finer [illegible] thoroughly washed and dried. The finest quality of sponge is very costly. It is sold by weight, and the dealers at Smyrna, the principal market, understand how to make it hold a great deal of very fine sand. Indeed, when a case is opened and the sponges are beaten, the sand often far outweighs the sponges.—American Agriculturist for March.

Try the Savoy Cabbage.

The cauliflower, the most delicious of all varieties of the cabbage, is of too much uncertainty to be recommended for the the farm garden. The Savoy cabbages are almost as tender as the cauliflower, have a distinct flavor, and a marrowy consistence of there own, which some prefer to cauliflower. These being as easily raised as the common cabbage, are within the reach of all. Those who have cultivated Savoy cabbages need no advice; to those who have not, we say, by all means try the Savoys. The English authors of works on gradening regard them as so different that they class them by themselves, under Savoys, and not among the cabbages. When we first knew them there was but one kind, "the Savoy," now there are a dozen or more Savoys, including early and late kinds. Perhaps the "Improved American Savoys will be the best for those who try Savoys for the first time. Afterwords they will be glad to test the early and late kinds. The seeds are to be sown and the plants treated exactly as those of the ordinary cabbages. —American Agriculturist for March.

Why Farmers Fail to Raise Melons.

Many farmers in the more Northern States fail in the melon crop. The vines grow, blossom, and bear fruit perhaps, but it is small and poor in quality; often unfit for cattle feed. This frequently occurs in the same locality, and on the same kind of soil, where a skillful gardener raises melons of good size and finest flavor. No doubt melons can be grown more easily in a southern than in a northern climate; but it is true of this crop, as of many others, that it reaches its highest excellence in the northern limits of the belt where it will mature. For example the Valley of the Connecticut River, especially in Hartford county, is somewhat famous for its fine watermelons. There, as in some other localities, the facility for marketing them by a near navigable stream has led to their cultivation as a staple crop. But certain it is, the sandy alluvium abounding in that valley is admirably adapted to melons. A common cause of failure with this crop, is the lack of sufficient manure. One puts a shovelful of manure under the seed, without care for the rest of the ground where the roots are to penetrate and seek most of their food. The melons are gross feeders, and require much water to supply the abundant juices and large evaporation from their extensive leaf surface, while the northern season is none too long for them. They grow with great rapidity in hot weather, and the most must be made of the summer months, by supplying them with all the food they can appropriate; it should be broad-casted with plenty of well-rotted stable manure, and plowed as long before planting as possible, that it may be well diffused through the soil. Early in August we visited a garden where the melon patch, about a quarter acre, had received twelve cartloads of manure, of about a half cord each. The melons apparently never suspected they were not growing in the tropics. There were plenty of them, and of Cassabas, and Nutmegs, beautiful to the eye, and melting upon the palate. There is great satisfaction in raising fruits perfect after their kind, only possible in northern climate, with abundant manure.—Wm. Clift, in American Agriculturist for March.

Producing New Varieties of Potatoes.

The tubers will sometimes, though rarely, "sport," and produce a different variety from the one planted, giving the impression that they will "mix in the hill." The only way to be certain of producing new varieties, is to plant the real seeds, those found in the fruit or "ball," that succeeds the flowers at the top of the vine. Each seed in a ball may produce a distinct variety. That wonderful seed ball which contained the seed from which came the Early Rose, also produced several other varieties, some of which were good enough to be propagated. People have been deterred from trying to raise potatoes from the seed by the statement in the books, copied from English writers, that the tubers first obtained were very small, and required several years of cultivation before their quality could be ascertained. Mr. Breese, who was the fortunate originator of the Early Rose, and has had much experience in raising seedlings, informed us that he treated the potato seeds just as he did those of the tomato, sowing the seeds in the same manner, and setting out the plants at the same time. If a seedling did not at the end [illegible]

MORTGAGE SALE.

WHEREAS, DEFAULT HAS BEEN MADE in the conditions of a certain mortgage executed and delivered by Henry S. Begemon and Emelia Begemon his wife mortgagors, to Henry Hammel mortgagee, dated the thirteenth day of March, A. D. eighteen hundred and eighty-two and recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds, of the County of Polk, in the State of Minnesota, on the fifteenth day of March A. D. 1882, at ten o'clock and five minutes a. m., in book "B" of mortgages, on page 640 on which there is claimed to be due, at the date of this notice, the amount of two hundred and forty-five dollars and interest thereon at the rate of ten per cent. per annum from the 13th day of March A. D. 1882, and no action or proceeding has been instituted at law or in equity to recover the debt secured by said mortgage or any part thereof.

Now, notice is hereby given, that by virtue of a power of sale contained in said mortgage, and of the statute in such case made and provided, said mortgage will be foreclosed by sale of the mortgaged premises therein described at public auction at the front door of the Court House in the City of Crookston, in the County of Polk, and State of Minnesota, on Saturday the eighth (8th) day of March A. D. eighteen hundred and eighty-four, at two o'clock in the afternoon, to satisfy the amount which shall then be due on said mortgage, with the interest thereon, and costs and expenses of sale, and twenty-five dollars attorney's fees, as stipulated in said mortgage in case of foreclosure.

The premises described in said mortgage, and so to be sold, are the lot, piece or parcel of land situated in the County of Polk, and State of Minnesota, and known and described as follows, to-wit: The southeast quarter (¼) of section number four (4) in township number one hundred and fifty-one (151) north, of range number forty-four (44) west, of 5th principal meridian, containing 160 acres of land.

MORTGAGE SALE.

DEFAULT HAVING BEEN MADE IN THE payment of the sum of five hundred and twenty-eight and forty-nine one hundredths dollars, ($528 49-100,) which is claimed to be due at the date of this notice upon a certain mortgage duly executed and delivered by Carrie Dewey and Alvah Dewey her husband to E. D. Childs bearing date the 14th day of June A. D. 1883 and, with a power of sale therein contained, duly recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds in and for the County of Polk, and State of Minnesota, on the 19th day of June A. D. 1883, at 2 o'clock p. m., in book "N" of mortgages, on page 50, to secure the payment of a certain promissory note for the sum of five hundred dollars payable September 14th, 1883 with interest at the rate of ten per cent. per annum until paid, and duly executed and delivered by said Carrie Dewey and Alvah Dewey her husband, and no action or proceeding having been instituted, at law or otherwise, to recover the debt secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof, or the interest thereof.

Now therefore, notice is hereby given, that by virtue of the power of sale contained in said mortgage, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the premises described in and conveyed by said mortgage, viz: Lots eight and nine (8 and 9) in block five (5) and the east half of lot twenty-two (22) in block two (2) (all situate in the village of Fisher) according to the original plat thereof on file in the office of the Register of Deeds, in and for said Polk County, and State of Minnesota; with the hereditaments and appurtenances; which sale will be made by the sheriff of said Polk County, at the front door of the Court House, in the city of Crookston, in said County, and State, on the 29th day of March A. D. 1884, at ten o'clock a. m., of that day, at public vendue, to the highest bidder for cash, to pay said debt and interest, and the taxes, if any, on said premises, and twenty-five dollars attorney's fees as stipulated in and by said mortgage in case of foreclosure, and the disbursements allowed by law; subject to redemption at any time within one year from the day of sale, as provided by law.

Dated February 7th, A. D 1884.

'ROUND HOME.

Mr. J. P. Lundin and C. Warren, of Stephen, were in the city on Monday.

Don't fail to secure your seats for "Led Astray," the finest drama of the season.

Reserved seats for the Breyer Comedy Company entertainment can be obtained at Morris' Bros., jewelry store.

Services at the Norwegian Lutheran church Sunday, March 9th, at one o'clock p. m. by Rev. A. C. Anderson.

Call at Morris Bros. jewelry store on Monday morning next and secure your reserved seats for "Led Astray."

The snow train was engaged on Monday hauling snow from the cut and dumping it into the river. The big snow storm of Sunday filled the cut nearly full.

Charlie Davis was out on Monday. He went as far as Braley's barber shop and back home. He is steadily improving and will soon be as good as new.

Put down one in your programme for the oyster supper at Land Office Hall next week Friday night, under the auspices of the Congregational young people.

See the Breyer Comedy Company next Saturday evening at Ericsson's Hall in the "Child Stealer."

Mr. W. H. Mathews, G. P. Cragin, C. E. Cragin, John M. Martin, J. R. Conway and G. H. Morse and wife accompanied the Ada singers and were at the concert and ball on Friday evening last.

Mr. Felix Fournet has returned from a pleasant visit to France and reports having had a good time. He was two weeks in crossing the big drink going over. He says Yvernault will be back in April.

Mr. E. C. Davis started on the survey for the Grand Forks, Crookston and Lake Superior R. R., Wednesday. He proposes to make an overland trip to Brainerd before the actual survey will be commenced.

Mr. Baldwin succeeds Mr. George Merritt, as representative of Joyslin & Merriam, Minneapolis, and paid his first visit to this city on Friday last. Mr. Baldwin is one of the good boys whom it is a pleasure to recommend to the patrons of J. & M.

Breyer is himself again, and will appear on Saturday evening at Ericsson's Hall in the "Child Stealer." Secure your seats at once.

The Democratic Broadaxe, Fargo's new Democratic daily has appeared. It is a neat and spicy newspaper, but seems to overlook the fact that the good generally die young. If there are Democrats enough in the Northwest it may possibly pull through.

C. S. Douglas, M. P., and Mr. W. N. Fairbanks, of Emerson, gave us a call on Friday last. They were appointed a committee to invite the cities and villages in the Red River Valley to send in delegates to the Emerson convention on the 4th and 5th.

Hon. B. Sampson says that the prospects of the Nelson bill passing are so good that if it fails it will be because the members from our own State go back on their premises and fail to support it heartily. He says that he has friends watching that point and will know who to blame if the bill does not pass.

Refering to our item in reference to Mr. Corser's forest trees, in last week's issue Mr. F. T. Haseltine informs us that he has contracted to supply Mr. Corser 4,500 trees for spring delivery, one third ash, boxalder and cottonwood. They will be set in rows four feet apart 20 inches in the row and will cover ten acres of ground.

Mr. John O. Juve left on Tuesday with three loads of goods for his farm near Moorhead, Clay Co., his family will leave in a few days. John says that he is going to raise No. 1 hard to ship over the great Hudson's Bay route. John is a good boy and will be missed by his many friends in Polk Co., who wish him abundant success.

The Dramatic Club, on Monday, received a telegram from Chicago stating that they would be unable to receive their costumes for next week. They have therefore been compelled to postpone the presentation of "Led Astray" one week, and will positively appear March 19th and 20th. The sale of reserved seats will take place as advertised before.

With Col. John Stephens in charge of its Agricultural and Col. R. P. We have one consolation in knowing that winter cannot last all summer, and it will be summer time by and by.

Mr. C. O. Webster, representing Marder, Luse & Co., Minneapolis, is in the city this week arranging for the disposal of the Northern Tier outfit.

Sheriff Zwickey will have an execution sale of horses and cattle on Saturday next at Schrader's barn. Now's your chance to secure a good team for spring's work very cheap.

Mr. Frank M. Rockwell, of the Chicago Y. M. C. A., is holding gospel meetings in the Baptist chapel every evening this week which are largely attended and deep interest manifested. All are cordially invited. Prayer meeting at 4:00 o'clock p. m., preaching 7:30.

On Saturday evening the Breyer Comedy Company will appear at Ericsson's Hall, in the sensational drama entitled "The Child Stealer." Mr. Breyer has fully recovered from the severe illness which affected him on his last visit and is as good as ever. We bespeak for friend Breyer a full house. Our exchanges all speak in the highest terms of the company.

The department was called out Tuesday night to extinguish a fire in Nels P. Johnson's saloon, on Sampson's Addition. The building was entirely destroyed and the department had hard work to save the hotel adjoining which was blackened up on the east side considerably. The saloon was insured in a small amount. The cause of the fire is a mystery as there was no chance for it to have caught from the stove and when first discovered it was in a corner of the building remote from the stove. It is thought to be incendiary.

The Concert given by Maxwell Division No. 75, O. R. C., on Friday evening of last week was a grand affair. The overture, rendered by the Grand Forks Orchestra, consisting of Fred Walker, cornet, H. Thoresen, violinist, Wm. Schront, pianist and Ed. Horton trombone, was well rendered, showing that they evidently understood their business. The 1st piece, a male quartette, "Let me dream while life shall linger," was sung by the Ada Coral Club, consisting of Fred Koylo, 1st tenor, Walt Cragin, 2d tenor, Ben Ashelman 1st bass and Geo. Ashelman 2d bass, with Miss Emma Wells at the piano. The piece was heartily applauded and the audience could not be satisfied until the club reappeared and sung "The Cobbler and the Crow." A recitation, "The Deacon's Confession" was excellently rendered by Miss Marie Hale, of Grand Forks, who was recalled and gave a short recitation without a name. "Once Again" a solo, was next sung by Miss Coultrey, of Winnepeg, with fine effect. Mr. C. J. Kops then favored the audience with Beethoven's "Sonata Quasi Una" which was rapturously applauded. Mr. Miller being absent, Miss A. G. Castle, of Ada, sang "The Rose Bush," holding the audience spell-bound during her singing. Miss Clara Robinson, of Grand Forks, recited "Too late for the Train" in her usual happy manner, then Mrs. Mills, of Winnipeg, sang the "Kary Dance" in a very pleasing manner, followed by a duet, Contralto and Bass, which was well sung by Miss A. G Castle and Ben Ashelman, of Ada. Then came a piano solo with flute accompaniment well rendered by own Col. Gorgas and Mrs. H. Robertson. After a short intermission the orchestra introduced the second part with one of their inimitable pieces then followed "The Bugle horn" by the "Ada Choral Club" which was so vociferously applauded that the club had to return and sing a comic song which brought the house down. Miss Marie Hale then gave the audience a pleasant taste of "Love in a Balloon," after which came a beautiful solo "I wait for Thee" well rendered by Mrs. F. J. McLean. Mr. Geo. D. Ashelman then sang a bass solo "Thy Sentinel am I" in his usual happy manner. Miss Dollie Bunnell sang a solo entitled "A bird from over the Sea" which was so well enjoyed that nothing would satisfy the audience but her re-appearance when she sang "Johnny is a Railroad Boy" eliciting hearty applause. Miss Clara Robinson here recited "How Rubenstein Played," followed by Miss Coultrey who sang "That Traitor, Love." Recalled she sang "The Three Old Maids of Lee". Mrs. Mills sang "Sweet Spirit hear my Prayer" and as an encore Home Sweet Home. The last piece was a violin solo with piano accompaniment—Fantasia—Das Recktlager in Granada, so well rendered by Messrs. C. J. Kops and C. E. Schaueffer that the audience clamored for a repetition. The stage manager Mr. W. M. Griffin here tried to say a few words but could not hear himself think and was relieved of the necessity by the re-appearance of Messrs. Kops and Schaueffer who got in their work in excellent shape allowing Mr. Griffin then an opportunity of thanking the audience and announcing that a social dance would follow. The dance was an enjoyable affair and all departed glad they had been there.

Spelling School.

There will be a spelling school held in the lecture room of the Congregational church Friday evening, March 7th. Ten cents admittance. Every one invited. The best speller to have a prize of a beautiful book of poems. Mrs. Braley and Mr. Smith will choose sides. Mr. Farnsworth will pronounce the words. Come and see every one else spelled down.

Led Astray.

It is with pleasure we are able to announce to our readers the fact that the Crookston Dramatic Club is now prepared, and will on Wednesday and Thursday evenings, March 19th and 20th, produce the great emotional drama in five acts entitled "Led Astray." This is the strongest and most able work of the renowned author Dion Boucicault and wherever it has been produced in the leading and most popular theaters throughout the United States, has been hailed with eagerness and its presentation attended with wild applause. The club has been hard at work upon this difficult undertaking for the past five or six weeks, and neither expense or labor have been spared to render this their most successful efforts. Below we give the cast of characters and bespeak for them the liberal patronage their earnest efforts deserve:

Citizens Meeting.

Pursuant to call a meeting was held in city hall on Monday at 4 p. m., for the purpose of electing delegates to attend the International convention held at Emerson on Tuesday and Wednesday, March 4th and 5th. Mr. K. D. Chase was elected chairman and H. E. Cooke, secretary. Mr. W. D. Hurlbut was called upon to explain the object of the meeting who briefly stated the substance of what Messrs. Douglas and Fairbanks had told the few of our citizens whom they met on Friday evening in relation to the object of the meeting. On motion the following gentlemen were unanimously elected to represent Polk County in that convention:

E. M. Walsh, H. E. Cooke, P. C. Sletten, Hon. B Sampson, Hon Halvor Steenerson, Wm. Box, and W. F. Zwickey. The delegates go uninstructed. Adjourned sine die.

MINNESOTA NEWS.

James announces himself as an independent candidate for the Minneapolis mayoralty on the broad-gauge system.

The Minneapolis Armory Fair closed with between $5,000 and $6,000 in the treasury.

In the legislature of Connecticut an adverse report was made on the bill permitting savings banks to invest in Minnesota state bonds, those of the cities of St. Paul and Minneapolis and of the Illinois Central railroads and leased lines. The chairman of the committe explained that Minnesota repudiated her debt some years ago, and paid only 50 cents on the $1. Concerning other bonds, the committee was not satisfied of the expediancy of allowing investment in them.

Matta Miles of Austin, route agent on the La Crosse and Sioux Falls run, will be transferred to the Chicago and Minneapolis run. W. W. Street of La Crosse to Sioux Falls.

As an east-bound passenger, was nearing Cokato, about one and one-hal miles west of town, on the 20th, it struck and instantly killed an old man named Peter Peterson, who lived three miles west of Cokato. Peterson and another man, Andrew Peterson, were returning home from Cokato when they met the train. The unfortunate man's neighbors tried to get him off the track, but did not succeed. He was partially blind and intoxicated.

At the meeting of the board of directors of the St. Paul & Northern Pacific on Thursday an important contract between that company and the Minneapolis, Sault Ste. Marie & Atlantic was approved, and was to-day executed by both President Harris and President Washburn. This contract was agreed upon and proposed last fall, before Gen. Washburn's departure for Washington; but it had not been approved until this meeting, on account of the unsettled condition of things in the Northern Pacific board and the change of officials. The contract provides for the joint use of all the terminal facilities of the Northern Pacific in Minneapolis, including the new iron bridge.

Capt. E. C. Babb, of Minneapoli commander of the G. A. R. department of Minnesota, has received a communication from H. P. Lloyd, commander of the department of Ohio, appealing for aid in behalf of members who have suffered during the great flood. Posts and members can forward contributions to Capt. Babb, for which receipts will be sent promptly to the proper destination.

Adjt. Gen. McCarthy has issued three commissions from his office. Sergeant William Dawson, Jr., of Company C, St. Paul, First regiment, was commissioned second lieutenant of that company. Second Lieut, O. J. Clyde, Little Falls, of company K, Second regiment, was commissioned first lieutenant of the same company. First Sergeant Close of the same place and company was commissioned second lieutenant, vice Clyde, promoted.

Paul Gutherz, the St. Louis artist, who spent a portion of last summer in St. Paul and is well known in art circles here, has painted a large picture representing a Dakota farm scene. Mr. Gutherz found the material for his sketches on a wheat farm of 15,000 acres near Fargo. The painting is to be sent to Paris to be exhibited in the Salon of 1884, and will be shipped immediately, as the Salon opens in a few weeks The picture has been photographed.

H. H. Young, setcreeary of the state board of immigration, states that the prospects of a large immigration into Minnesota this year are much better than at the corresponding time last year. Mr. Young recently received a letter from Amsterdam, the writer of which stated that there was every prospect for an unusually large immigration from Holland this year.

On the night of the 15th of last October Charles A. Lipe, operator and station agent of the Manitoba company at Pelican Rapids, was reported robbed of $615 in money, belonging to the American Express company and the railway company. No clue was found to the burglary, but last week one William S. Agnew of Aldrich, Wadena county, made some statements which led to the arrest of both himself and Lipe, and a hearing was given Lipe here to-day. Agnew turned state's evidence, and testified that Lipe came to him, made the statement that he was short in his accounts, and that he should help him out by going through his house and feigning a robbery. The doors were left open according to agreement, and Agnew went through the programme with masks, pistols and all the accoutrements. Lipe's clothes were carried off and laid beside the road some distance from the house, $20 in a pocket which was intended for the would-be robber.

Deupty Sheriff Ego of Hennepin county put in State Prison the following persons, commited and sentenced: James McConnelly, burglary; 3 years. Albert Armstrong, larceny in a dwelling house; 2 years. Louis Croix, larceny in a dwelling house; 1 year and 3 months. James Burke, larceny from the person; [illegible] years. Jacob Lininger, larceny [illegible] a shop; 2 years, and Charles Schultz, larceny in a dwelling house, 1 year and [illegible] months.

Thomas J. Walton of Minneapolis, who labors under the idea that parties desire to lynch him, was adjudged insane [illegible] committed to St. Peter.

Mrs. P. O. Mansen of St. Paul says her husband has lighted out with all his money, $9,000.

The body of Edward Rouse was found at a deserted house in Minneapolis on the 27th.

The committee appointed at the meeting of farmers at Montevideo, recently, reported resolutions regarding discrimination in favor of corporations and against wheat raisers, that our only hope for redress and justice is in legislation—in laws that shall do exact and equal justice to all men and all classes; that shall so regulate and govern the railroad traffic and a system of sworn inspection regulated by law; that the farmers will support no candidate for the legislature who will not pledge himself to vote and work for such measures.

The people of Morris have voted almost unanimously to build a brick school house, to cost $100,000. The building now in use, which cost $7,000, was erected only four years ago, and was thought by many to be extravagantly large at that time. Morris has one of the fifty high schools in the state, and offers educational advantages seldom equaled in Western towns.

Rev. Boyd Phelps of Morris has just been apprised of the sudden death of the wife of his son, Prof. Thomas Phelps at their home in Wilmot, Dak.

The Jewell Nursery company of Lake City has become a joint stock concern, with a capital of $100,000, the incorporators being J. M. Underwood, S. M. Emery and J. Cole Doughty. The company will not only carry on an extensive nursery business, but breed, rear, buy and sell pure blooded Holstein and grade cattle, besides dealing in real estate. Officers will be elected March 15, and annually thereafter.

Mower county can probably show one of the best records in the state. Not a cent of indebtedness for anything except in connection with the elegant new court house just finished. The records show that the complete cost of this, including foundation, grading, etc., will be $70,000. This is all paid but $12,000, and this latter sum is fully met by the tax levy of the present year. In the treasury there is over $25,000 cash.

Fire broke out at Duluth Tuesday night the 26th inst, in a two-story frame building on Superior street, next to the Merchants hotel, and owned by F. C. Lruschke and occupied by H. P. Wieland & Co., furniture dealers. The flames communicated to Thomas Whitaker's two-story frame, occupied by himself as a saloon. This was destroyed; as was also the Superior house, owned by John L. Dodge of Great Barrington, Mass., and A. Breausseau, and occupied by the latter. The Merchants hotel on the east next took fire. This is a three-story frame, built in the spring of 1882 by William Weinhardt. The greatest efforts were made to save this, but it was nearly half consumed. The total loss is about $25,000.

The department of public instruction is at present preparing the statement of the state school apportionment, and will have the table ready next week. There are 100,692 pupils, and the apportionment amounts to 39 cents for each pupil.

Gen. T. F. Rosser of Indianapolis, has been appointed chief engineer and general manager of the Nicaragua canal and is to leave Minneapolis for New York purposing to sail as soon as possible. The movers in the project desired Gen. Rosser to sail on the 1st of March but this was impossible. He will spend three months in making the preliminary examination, the engineers, who made the survey accompanying him.

A party of lumbermen reached Brainerd Thursday from the woods north of Aitken, bringing the body of a lumberman named Gilmore, who had been killed by a falling tree in the lumber camp.

Chief Justice Gilfillan writes from New Orleans that he is rapidly recovering his health and enjoying himself greatly. He will remain in the South during the winter.

The annual report of the state board of corrections and charities of Wisconsin, just issued, says that there is not a jail in that state as good as that at Winona, Minn.

All day Tuesday last a blizzard held sway over the country in the northwest, and interfered somewhat with the movement of trains. There was no snow fall but the wind was about as bad as it could be and swept everything before it.

There is a report of a boy missing from his home, about nine miles west of Sleepy Eye, Brown county, about which there is some mystery. The boy had some six hundred dollars coming to him from his father. One day recently his father and mother went to a neighbor's visiting, and the boy was left of home. When evening came the father said he would go home, and do the chores and return. When told that the boy would do them, he replied that the boy was mad and he could not trust him to do the chores. The father went home and returned after a time, since which time the boy has not been seen. The neighbors soon ascertained that an old dry well on the premises had been filled and suspicion was aroused that the boy had been killed and buried in the well, and although talk has been had of opening the well, the father closely guards it and threatens to shoot any one who attempts to excavate it.

P. H. Kelly, Minnesota member of the democratic national committee, stated that Robert A. Smith, of the banking firm of Dawson, Smith & Scheffer, St. Paul, would be chosen as the Minnesota member of the democratic national committee, nominated on the 19th inst. in Washington.

P. P. Persons, H. H. Randolph, O. G. Dunn, Joseph Rogers, P. Longfellow, Ames and Alderman were arraigned before the United States district court at Fargo, and, with the exception of P. P. Persons, pleaded guilty to the charge of timber stealing. All the prisoners pleading guilty were sentenced to [illegible] fine of $25 and imprisonment [illegible]

A Forfeited Northern Pacific Land Grant.

Washington Special—By a vote of 7 to 4 the house committee on public lands agreed to report favorably a bill to forfeit all the granted land contiguous to that portion of the Northern Pacific not completed July 4, [illegible]. The vote was as follows:

For the bill—Messrs. Cobb, Payson, Anderson, Henley, Strait, Lewis and Scales.

Against it—Messrs. Belford, Oates, Van Eaton and Shaw.

When the committee met Tuesday morning both Messrs Scales and Anderson withdrew their resolutions offered Wednesday. That offered by Mr. Scales provided for the forfeiture of land alongside that portion of the Northern Pacific railroad not completed to date. He said he had understood the power of Congress to forfeit the land of the Northern Pacific had been waived, but upon examination into the legal aspect of the case had found that he had held a wrong impression. Mr. Anderson's resolution provided for the forfeiture of land not earned within the time specified by the act making the grant. As a substitute Mr. Anderson offered a resolution providing that all grants except unpatented lands be forfeited. Mr. Strait moved to amend the substitute so as to provide that only land opposite the unconstructed line from Wallula to Portland be forfeited. The amendment was lost on a viva voce vote. An amendment offered by Mr. Van Eaton providing for the forfeiture of the entire grant was also lost, the vote being 3 to 8. Mr. Anderson's substitute was then put upon its passage and the same vote cast. Mr. Henley renewed the resolution originally offered by Mr. Anderson, which provided for the forfeiture of all land not earned by the time specified by the act. The vote was, as stated above, 7 4, in favor of the resolution.

State Dinners at the White House.

Washington Special: At the state dinner given by the president on the evening of the 21st, the table was laid with fifty-four covers. The floral decorations included a ship of carnations freighted with roses and rigged with smilax and acacia flowers. This rested on a lake of violets and on either side were bowls of long-stemmed Marechal Neil roses. At the ends of the table were circular baskets of tulips flanked by cushions of carnations with the colors massed in sections. Belt bouquets of roses violets and lillies of the valley were placed at the plates of the ladies, and wax lights in gilt candelabra added to the effective beauty of the decorations. The windows of the state dining room were filled with azaleas and palms, and the latter with other tropical plants, and bright foliage decked the alcoves and mantels of the east room. At 8 o'clock the president escorted Mrs. Morrill to the dining room, Senator Morrill taking Mrs. McElroy. Among the other guests following were: Senator Dawes and Mrs. Maxey, Senator Maxey and Mrs. Cockrell, Senator Cockrell and Mrs. Dawes, Senator Pendleton and Mrs. Voorhees, Senator Sabin and Mrs. Henderson, Senator Hampton and Mme. Christine Nillson, Representative Belford and Mrs. Sabin, Representative Washburn and Mrs. Spriggs, Representative Kasson and Mrs. Wadsworth, Representative James and Mrs. Washburn. After dinner Mme. Nillson delighted the company by singing several charming airs.

A Howl From the Thunderer.

The London Times' leader of Tuesday, the 25th, says: "It is intolerable. We are exposed to this succession of plots from a nation professing to be friendly with us, and with which we only desire to live in peace and unity. We know that the Americans are aware of the identity of the plotters of the outrages, and it would be no hard task for the American government to end the whole thing. We have done our part. We have made the private manufacture of explosives a penal crime. The result is conspirators have been compelled to change their ground of operations and find in America a safe refuge, and a government which will not interfere with their operations. It is impossible that we shall submit to this. Dynamiters are a common enemy which no civilized country can tolerate without disgrace. These miscreants have only done what American journals have been allowed to advocate, for what rewards have been only promised, and for what public meetings have applauded. The time has arrived to address a strong remonstrance to the government allowing this to be continued. Respectable Americans are ashamed of the inaction of their rulers. They must now join us and make their voices heard and obeyed. It remains for America to aid us, as she alone can nip the mischief; but our demand is one that a civilized nation is bound not to disregard."

Cowboy Lynching in Dakota.

Deadwood, Dak., Special—Harry Tuttle, one of the cowboys engaged in the fight with Deputy United States Marshal Raymond and posse at Stoneville, ten days ago, in which fight he was shot through the left elbow and was abandoned by his comrades, was brought to the county hospital at Spearfish for treatment. Saturday last a party organized to lynch him, but were dissuaded by better minded men. Tuesday night, a party of eight, wearing buffalo coats and masks, appeared at the hospital, half the party remaining outside, while the others entered the ward, where they terrified the only nurse present, pounced upon the helpless victim, who before he could utter more than a piercing scream, was gagged and dragged, without clothing, other than a nightshirt, from the building, through the cold night air, to a cliff a short distance away. There a rope was fastened to a tree overhanging the precipice, a noose was formed around the victim's neck, and without an opportunity to ask for mercy, or time to make peace with his God, Tuttle was pushed over the brink. The fall broke a leg, but did not dislocate his neck, and the man died by strangulation.

In Love With a Coachman.

Milwaukee, Special.—A scandal is about to break out on the West side. It seems that the wife of a well-known and quite wealthy gentleman became enamored of her coachman. The matter was talked about by the neighbors until it finally reached the ears of the husband. He raised a terrible row, and at once discharged the ambitious carriage driver. The gentlemen's business keeps him down town from an early hour in the morning until late in the afternoon, and it has been noticed by the interested neighbors that the discharged driver visits the house of his former employer with great regularity almost daily. The scandalous affair has been gossiped about for weeks, and many people are charitable enough to believe that the wife is insane. Last summer she was frequently seen sitting in a shady nook, with the coachman by her side. Other manifestations of her regard for the driver have been noticed. The affair will probably end in a divorce suit.

Gospel Facts.

[The following has appeared in nearly every newspaper throughout the United States, and is one of the finest testimonials ever won by a medicine, proprietary or otherwise. Dr. Crane (he is a graduate of medicine as well as a clergyman) gives this evidence without any solicitation whatever. It will repay all to read it.]

"I have never seen a medicine more perfectly adapted to its various applications than Thomas' Eclectric Oil. I was for many years a sufferer from quinsy; Thomas' Eclectric Oil cured me. My wife and child had diphtheria, Thomas' Eclectric Oil cured them, and if taken in season it will cure seven times out of ten. I am confident it is a cure for the most obstinate cold or cough, and if taken into the head by the nostrils two or three a week will positively remove the most offensive case of catarrh, and notwithstanding the delicate nature of the mucous membrane of the nasal organs, can be taken up with perfect impunity. For deafness and earache it has done wonders to my certain knowledge. It is the only medicine dubbed patent that I have ever felt like recommending, and I am anxious to see it in every place, for I tell you I would not be without it in the house for any consideration. It also operates in asthma, dyspepsia, and whenever it is used it becomes indispensable to household safety. I am ready to give any one the benefit of my observation, both as to its effects and mode of application, if they will drop me a postal [illegible]—Rev. E. F. Crane, Dunkirk, N. Y. Dr. Thomas' Eclectric Oil is sold everywhere by Druggists. [illegible]

A Splendid Remedy for Lung Diseases.

Dr. Robt. Newton, late President of the Eclectic College of the City of New York, and formerly of Cincinnati, Ohio, used Dr. Wm. Hall's Balsam very extensively in his practice, as many of his patients, now living, and restored to health by the use of this invaluable medicine, can amply testify. He always said that so good a remedy ought not to be considered merely as a patent medicine, but that it ought to be prescribed freely by every physician as a sovereign remedy in all cases of Lung diseases. It is a sure cure for Consumption, and has no equal for all pectoral complaints.

Great Sale of Percheron-Norman Horses.

In another column will be found the advertisement of the first sale of imported Percheron Norman horses ever held in the northwest. The horses are very fine specimens of this powerful and popular race, and what is practically of the greatest value to the pruchaser, are thoroughly acclimated, and ready for service. This being the first sale, the stock will no doubt go at low prices, and somebody will get great bargains.

From Elk Mills, Missouri.

Dr. C. D. Warner:—Dear Sir:—This is to certify that I have used nearly a bottle of your White Wine of Tar Syrup, and I can safely and conscientiously recommend it to any person as the best medicine I have ever used for throat and lung diseases, and if it cost five dollars a bottle I would keep it on hand if I was able.—Thankfully, yours truly, Elder T. Stephens.

I Have Tried It.

Dear Doctor:—I have tried your medicine, and believe that any one who is troubled with Cough, Hoarseness or Lameness about the chest or lungs can not well afford to be without the White Wine of Tar Syrup. Your thankful friend, Rev G. W. Pattison, Pastor St. Charles M. E. Church St. Charles, Iowa.

Charles Hale, seventy three, a pauper in Jefferson, Ohio, is heir to $50,000, left by his brother in New Haven.

"Our Experience

with Allen's Lung Balsam for colds and coughs has been of the most satisfactory character," writes the editor of a leading paper. He is only one in thousands who has tried this "Balsam" and has been convinced of its virtue and merits.

Ely's Cream Balm is doing wonders. I advise sufferers from Catarrh to lay other remedies aside. I believe it is the only remedy that will cure this terrible disease, from which I have suffered twenty years.—Charles Garrabrant, Shoe Merchant, 833 Broad St., Newark, N. J. (Price 50 cents per bottle.)

Occasional doses of Dr. Sanford's Liver Invigorator will keep the liver in good order. Sure.

TUTT'S PILLS

TORPID BOWELS, DISORDERED LIVER, and MALARIA.

From these sources arise three-fourths of the diseases of the human race. These symptoms indicate their existence: Loss of Appetite, Bowels costive, Sick Headache, fullness after eating, aversion to exertion of body or mind, Eructation of food, Irritability of temper, Low spirits, A feeling of having neglected some duty, Dizziness, Fluttering at the Heart, Dots before the eyes, highly colored Urine, CONSTIPATION, and demand the use of a remedy that acts directly on the Liver. As a Liver medicine TUTT'S PILLS have no equal. Their action on the Kidneys and Skin is also prompt; removing all impurities through these three "scavengers of the system," producing appetite, sound digestion, regular stools, a clear skin and a vigorous body. TUTT'S PILLS cause no nausea or griping nor interfere with daily work and are a perfect

POTASH!

Iodide of Potassium is one of the strongest of the minerals used in medicine, and has produced much suffering in the world. Taken for a long time and in large doses, it dries up the gastric juices, impairs digestion, the stomach refuses food, and the patient declines in health and weight. Persons with Blood or Skin Diseases should be careful how they take these mineral poisons, as in most instances the effect of them is to almost permanently impair the constitution. To take the place of these poisons we offer you a safe, sure, prompt and permanent relief from your troubles. Swift's Specific is entirely a vegetable preparation, and it is easy to convince you of its merit.

I have cured permanently Blood Taint in the third generation by the use of Swift's Specific, after I had most signally failed with Mercury and Potash.

NISSA.

Gaston lighted a cigarette, and said:

"It is not a long story, but you will find it tragic. By Jove! it makes me shiver to think of it. You remember that the department of fine arts sent me to Persia two years ago. I was to write up the province of Irak-Adjemi. I began by taking up my quarters in Ispahan. At the end of three months I had finished my task, but if I had returned home at once, the department would never have believed that I was a man of any depth! I was just about bored to death, when luckily there was a change of governors. The Shah sent, in place of the former governor, his cousin, Maloom-Khan."

"The one who traveled in France?"

"Yes. And no doubt you remember meeting one of the heroes of my story, Mehmed-Aga; he was the prince's officer of ordnance. He has the rank of general, or rather, that of sertip, to use the Persian term."

"I remember him—a young man of about thirty, a gentlemanly fellow, something of a swell, who dined with us several times."

"You can appreciate my joy in meeting him again away off there. Besides, there is a peculiar charm about these half-Parisianized Orientals. Their native wildness is, to speak, refined and softened by contact with our ways of life. In a week the sertip and I were inseparable."

"And the story?"

"You are in too much of a hurry. I have not finished the introduction. One morning I was dreamily riding through the city, giving myself up for the hundredth time to the feeling that I was in fairyland. Imagine immense avenues, bordered on the right and on the left with arcades, and shaded by gigantic plane-trees at whose feet are streams of running water. Farther on—"

"A description! You are not working for the department, old fellow. You promised me a tragedy. Go on with the story, and, as you love me, no descriptions!"

Gaston gave a sigh of resignation and said:

"I was nearing the Kiosk of Ichechel-Intoun when I saw at the street-corner a woman in a litter. As a general thing Persian women on the street are like nothing so much as bundles. They are veiled, of course, or rather, they wear upon their heads a kind of striped curtain which covers the face. Oddly enough the woman whom I met did not entirely conceal her figure, which was slender and graceful and I could see her large eyes gleaming like coals of fire. My horse was walking, and I made him follow very slowly the bearers of the litter. It seems to me that the unknown looked back once or twice; but after all, as adventures of this kind in the East are somewhat unsatisfactory, I paid only slight attention to the matter. I had almost forgotten the occurrence when, two days after, I again met the litter. This time I was not alone Mehmed-Aga was walking with me. At the first glance I recognized the veiled lady, and especially remembered those extraordinary eyes which were still flashing fire. As before, she looked back, but this time the action was more pronounced. I glanced at the sertip, but he pretended to have noticed nothing. We walked along in this way for about 10 minutes, when the litter suddenly turned towards the Djoulffa Bridge. The bridge is one of the most beautiful sights in the world. It has 33 enormous arches, and spans that capricious stream, the Zend-Dehroud. In summer the river-bed is dry, but in November, which was the time of my story, the waters are as swift and turbulent as an Alpine torrent. The Djoulffa Bridge is somewhat of a popular resort for evening promenades, and so I hesitated about following my unknown openly for fear of compromising her. But there was no hesitation on her part. Suddenly she leaned half way out of the litter, and dropped her handkerchief upon the pavement."

"Well! Well! those Persian women are not slow! And the sertip said nothing?"

"For the moment, no. During the rest of the walk he was silent, biting his moustache with a preoccupied air. When we reached the palace, he said: 'Come in.' And when we were alone in his study, he began:

"'My dear friend. I made no comments a little while ago. But instead of keeping that handkerchief pressed tenderly against your heart, you must throw it into the fire.'

"'You wish me to do so?'

"'I do not wish that you should have your throat cut, and be thrown into the Zend-Dheroud. I am in charge of the police of the city, and I am responsible for you to the French legation.'

"'But—'

"'Not a word. You are astonishing people you Parisians! You think yourselves always on the Boulevard des Capucines! We are in the Orient, my friend; and in the Orient husbands are not to be trifled with. At Paris it may be different. Your unknown is not unknown to me. Her name is Nissa.'

"'Nissa?'

"'If the name is charming, the husband is not at all so. He is a wealthy merchant in the suburbs, famous for his violence and his jealousy. His mother was of English descent, but his own manners are wholly oriental. He would kill you like a dog.'

"'And what is the name of this Blue Beard of Ispahan?'

"'Astoulla. I do not wish you to make his acquaintance. But you know where he lives. It is he who occupies that house on the river bank just at the end of the bridge.'

"'And Nissa, what is said of her?'

"'O, my Frenchman! We do not talk about women here, or, rather, those whom we do talk about—' 'Ah, well?' they are sewn up in sacks and thrown into the river.'

"'How frightful!' [illegible]

"'Oh! we are civilized now,' replied the sertip coldly. 'Formerly a live cat would have been added to the contents of the sacks. When maddened by the water the cat would [illegible] the woman's face. [illegible] At least it is not customary. This in [illegible] of Europe.' [illegible]

[illegible]

my eyes that graceful figure, was bending out of the litter and with tiny hand waving, dropping, a handkerchief. A persistent voice was singing in my ear, like the refrain of a ballad, 'Nissa! Nissa!' Naturally I suffered all that night from nightmare. I dreamed that some one had given me an immense cat, named Astoulla, which was trying to tear my face! I waked at eleven the next morning, completely disenchanted.

II.

"In the evening I was promenading upon the terrace in the rear of my house, when a horrible looking old woman suddenly entered from the lower door. She wished to speak to me. Before the servant had time to ask me if I were willing to see her she was at my side. And when she had made sure that we were alone:

"'Are you brave?' she said, in a broken English which I could hardly understand.

"I smiled with that self-conceit which a man always feels when asked such a question. She continued:

"'I came to propose to you a walk. It is night. No one can see us. You are to follow me. When half-way I shall blindfold you, but you must swear to me not to attempt to find out where I am leading you.'

"I promised.

"She grinned in a way that made her still more hideous. I had agreed to her proposition just as I have told you, at once impelled by an irresistible impulse. The day, you see, had passed over my fears, the effects of the nightmare were little by little fading away, and I heard that persistent voice still singing in my ear, "Nissa! Nissa!" The old woman evidently came from her. I hurried up to my room and got a small revolver. Five minutes later we were on our way. It was mad, absurd; I confess it freely. But there are follies about which one does not stop to reason. Nissa, that unknown woman, possessed over me some mysterious power. I had not even seen her, and yet I madly longed to meet her. Her fiery glance was burning my heart. When we had come to the Djoulffa bridge the old woman stopped and took from her pocket a thick handkerchief, which she proceeded very deftly to bind over her eyes. I could see no longer. Then she grasped my hand, and I allowed her to lead me. By the increased coolness of the air I conjectured that we were crossing the river. Then I heard all about me the voices of the promenaders. It did not occur to me that they might notice us. I was walking wholly absorbed in my dream, thinking of the supple figure of the young woman, of her little hand, and her flashing eyes. In a few seconds the old woman turned to the right, but we were not quitting the banks of Zend-Dehroud. I could hear its turbulent rolling by and breaking for an instant against the arches of the bridge. At last my guide paused, and a key grated and in a whisper she said:

"Five steps only, and then I felt that my feet were pressing a soft, thick carpet. At the same moment she removed the bandage. I found myself in a small room, dimly lighted by a copper lamp. Ordinarily, in Persia, the walls are bare, but here it was very different. Incense was burning in a richly chased perfuming pan, resting upon a table of red and green mosaic, and filling the room with those Oriental odors which intoxicate one like the fragrance of old wine. Against the walls, hung with yellow cashmere, were musical instruments, the nefir, which is like our hautboy, kettledrums, two kematches, a kind of viol, and here and there arms in midst of pendent chains and necklaces. And below, the dull and regular murmuring of the river. By lifting a little drapery from the window I saw the water touched the very walls of the house. Almost immediately I heard a light rustling upon thy carpet. I turned. It was Nissa. I was transfixed with astonishment. She could not have been more than 17 or 18. Her thick, dark hair falling upon perfectly formed neck and shoulders reminded me of the "Salome" by Regnault. Her face, slightly amber in color, had all the changing lights of mother-of-pearl. But I was especially struck by the strange contrast between the exceeding whiteness of her teeth and the blackness of her eyes. The eyelashes, the tips of the lids, and her lips were painted. She smiled as she gazed at me with her still and burning eyes. I thought of the sertip's words and said to myself that that woman could not easily be frightened. However she took my hand and made me sit upon the the divan.

"'My husband has started for Teheran,' she said; 'and we have the time for pleasure!'

"She spoke English with a marked guttural accent. Then she struck a gong with a copper rod, and coffee was brought in. She began to talk rapidly, telling me that her life was very dreary, and that she had been interested in me at first sight. At the same time the expression of her eyes was becoming more and more tender, and her hand was softly pressing mine. She leaned nearer, and suddenly embraced me, fixing her lips upon mine. I was beginning to lose my head, when I heard a noise in the adjoining room. In an instant she sprang from my arms, and stood erect and trembling. Her welcome, her caresses and her sudden fear had followed each other so rapidly that I had no time to analyze my feelings. With the same unfailing grace and animation she ran to the wall, and without hesitation took down a slender little dagger and half concealed it in her sleeve. She turned to me, and with an emphatic gesture said: 'Wait!' Then she vanished behind the heavy hangings.

"A vague fear stole over me. I recalled the sertip's warnings. Possibly I had been a little imprudent. Suddenly I again heard a noise in the next room; there were sounds of voices, then a short struggle; at last, silence. At once the drapery was pushed aside and Nissa reappeared. She was very pale, as pale as the pearls upon her neck.

"She half leaned against the wall, looking like a white statue against the background of yellow drapery. She was still smiling, and in her smile revealing teeth as sharp as those of a young wolf. She took [illegible] the room. Her knife and hands were red. [illegible]

"'Good God! What has happened?' I exclaimed [illegible] complete contempt: 'And in a tone that I shall never forget, she said: "Oh! these Frenchmen! What nervousness!"

[illegible]

"She shrugged her shoulders, and called a maid whom she commanded to open a window. Then as if they were doing the most ordinary of acts, they lifted the body and dropped it into the river, whose waters closed over it. Upon my word! the adventure was becoming too oriental for a Parisian. I confess that I was seized with a wild terror—without waiting longer I ran away like a madman. Where I went, I have no idea. In 10 minutes I found myself again in the city, and I ran through the streets as if pursued by a legion of devils. When I had reached my apartments I fastened myself in with a double lock, cursing Nissa and all the houris of the Orient.

III.

"What a night! I did not sleep till morning, and then my sleep was like lead. When I awoke, the sun was high and streaming into my chamber. I was completely unstrung. What would happen? A man could not disappear without the law's taking cognizance of the affair. Nissa had not even made an attempt at concealment. The servant had seen and aided her. I should be implicated, and at the very idea of being associated in such a crime I felt my hair standing on end with horror. Should I confide everything to the French minister? Unfortunately he had just left, and the first secretary was too young for me to think of having recourse to him. In any event my future was ruined. It was a fine commission, that from the department of fine arts!

"All that day I remained in the same condition, keenly anxious, and not daring to go out. The evening came and still I had formed no resolution, and no news yet of Nissa. Had she been arrested? What had become of her? I retired early, but could not sleep. On the second day I could endure it no longer, and decided to see my friend, the sertip. Anything was preferable to the torturing uncertainty in which I was living. I was sure that Mehmed-Aga would not go out before breakfast. I arrived at his palace about noon. I was sure that he was in his study as usual. I was announced, and then entered. The sertip was reclining upon a divan peacefully smoking his chibouk.

"'Ah! it is you,' he said when he saw me.

'Are you well?'

"'Thank you, very well.'

"'By the way!' he said, 'have you heard the news?'

"'The news—the news? No, I—I have heard nothing.'

"'You remember Astoulla, the rich merchant, in the suburbs?'

"'Do I remem—'

"'Why, yes—Nissa's husband, whom I told you about.'

"I felt myself plushing to the roots of my hair. It was all over, the crime was known, and I did not dare to think of the end of the adventure. I muttered an almost inaudible 'yes.'

"'The poor devil,' continued the sertip; 'my dear friend, he has suddenly disappeared.'

"My throat was choking but I managed to say:

"'What! he has—he has disappeared? Jove! It is very—very strange.'

"'Yes, very strange.'

"And the sertip looked at me intently. I could bear it no longer. I was about to confess everything, when he said:

"'He was just setting out for Teheran. And suddenly—vanished. Nothing has been heard of him.'

"For the second time the sertip looked into my face. There was a short silence. Then puffing out a long thread of smoke, he added calmly:

"'God is great!'"—[Revue des deux Mondes.

Freemasonry Among Statesmen.

From a Washington Letter.

One of the oldest and most prominent members of the Masonic fraternity in the United States said to me a day or two ago at the Capitol: "It would surprise you if you knew how many of our big public men are Masons. President Arthur is a Mason and so is Secretary Folger and Secretary Teller. Teller is very prominent in Masonic circles, having received the 23d degree. President Edmunds is a Mason, as are also Senators Dolph of Oregon, Logan of Illinois, Coke and Maxey, of Texas, Garland of Arkansas, Williams of Kentucky, Dawes of Massachusetts, Palmer of Michigan, Ransom of North Carolina, Riddleberger of Virgina, Voorhees of Indiana, Plumb and Ingalls of Kansas, Hawley of Connecticut, Anthony of Rhode Island, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cockrell and Vest of Missouri, Fair and Jones of Nevada, Gorman of Maryland, McMillan of Minnesota, Manderson and Van Wyck of Nebraska, Sawyer of Wisconsin and Sewell of New Jersey. That makes twenty-eight Senators I know of, and probably some of the others are members. Of the twenty-eight which I have mentioned sixteen are Republicans, eleven Democrats, and one is Readjuster. Senator Dolph is the most eminent Mason among his associates, having received the 32d degree, but Senators Logan, Ingalls, Hawley and Gorman are Knights Templars."

How to Reduce One's Weight.

From the Graphic.

A woman weighing 200 pounds called on a physician for advice. He gave her the following instructions:

"1. For breakfast, eat a piece of beef or mutton as large as your hand, with a slice of white bread twice as large. For dinner the same amount of meat, or, if preferred, fish or poultry, with the same amount of farinaceous or vegetable food in the form of bread or potatoes. For supper, nothing.

"2. Drink only when greatly annoyed with thirst, then a mouthful of lemonade without sugar.

"3. Take three times a week some form of bath in which there shall be immense perspiration. The Turkish bath is best. You must work either in walking or in some other way several hours a day. [illegible]

FARM, HOUSE AND GARDEN.

Farm Notes.

D. M. Moninger, in relation to beef cattle, and preparing them for fat stock shows, says: "We are all after the cattle that mature early. It is from this type only that we can make up the steer that will dress 70 per cent, and over at three years old. This tells the quality of the animal, and also the skill of the feeder and breeder. In the rings of one, two and three-year-old steers, it is all wrong to make such remarks as "Too fat." Such remarks mislead the feeder who is preparing for the fat stock shows. I think we want fat cattle fully ripe, and no other kind, at a fat stock show."

Darwin gives much evidence to the effect that bumblebees are necessary to a full crop of clover seed. Dr. W. J. Beal, who has experimented largely for the past few years, says: "These experiments, with those made by Darwin and others, make it look as though bees and bumblebees help to fertilize the flowers of white and red clover, and cause the plants to set seed more freely." There seems little doubt that a scarcity of bumblebees would lesson the crop of clover. The common black bee cannot work on red clover, and as the bumblebees are few in numbers early in the summer, we see a very plausible explanation of the commonly observed fact that the first crop of red clover seeds poorly while the second crop bears well. The Italian, Cyprian, and Syrian bees work on red clover, and so may make us less dependent on the bumblebees.

Do what fencing you can at once, says the Maryland Farmer, and prepare the fencing stuff during bad weather, that it may be ready for use when wanted. If you intend to use wire, get it at once, and get the posts ready, so it can be put up speedily as soon as the ground permits it to be done well and solidly. We should put four wires and plant a post every rod apart. See that the starting end and corner posts are well rammed, secured tight and properly braced. Remember a wire is only a cheap and durable fence when properly built. Once well done it will give no trouble for many years. Plant locust or pear trees every 18 or 20 feet along the line to furnish living posts for the fence, as the posts now painted may decay or want renewal.

A correspondent of the Husbandman says that sulphur is a preventive of potato rot, and this is confirmed by the experience of a Vermont farmer, who rolled his cut potatoes in fine sulphur at planting and dusted the plants as they appeared above the ground. Neither rot, worm nor insect touched them, though potatoes on neighboring farms were badly damaged. His potatoes were excellent and the crop yielded well. There is no doubt that sulphur will assist materially in preventing fungus growth in other plants as well as potatoes, and it would be well if farmers give it a trial for such purposes the coming season.

It is from the west that the loudest call for action, on the part of the general government, in stamping out pleuro-pneumonia among the cattle. The west has more than one thousand millions of dollars invested in cattle, and a large part of these cattle are handled on the ranges in such a way that if the disease once makes its appearance it would be as useless to attempt so save a powder magazine after a spark had ignited it. This may seem an extravagant statement, but the fearful experiences of Australia, South Africa and Russia will bear it out. Whatever steps congress decides upon taking it should be borne in mind that no half-way measures will do. If it is right to undertake the work of exterminating a malignant disease which has cost Great Britain and her dependencies $500,000,000 (according to the London Times) and which may cost us as much more, it is right to do the work immediately and effectually.

There is to much neglect by publishers of American papers in changing English prices current to the comprehension of American readers. Not half the readers of American newspapers can tell the price of wheat when it is quoted "37s per quarter." Even if qualified, it would take some time to figure out what that would be per bushel. A "quarter" of wheat in England means a quarter of a ton, or about eight and one-third bushels, but practice calls it eight bushels. A shilling English is 24 cents American. So it can be ascertained that wheat at 37s per quarter is $1.11 per bushel. So our friend, as well as all our readers, will know how to estimate the price of wheat in England. But the publisher of a paper could easier translate foreign prices from English to American than for 5,000 of his readers to do it each for himself, and the other 5,000 forever remain ignorant of what it means.

Lights in the Barn.

Under the head of "Lights in the Barn," the Agriculturist says: "It is estimated that nine-tenths of all fires are caused by carelessness. Now is the season when the lantern is frequently used in the barn and we give a word of caution. Never light a lamp or lantern of any kind in the barn. Smokers may include their pipes and cigars in the above. The lantern should be lighted in the house or some outbuilding where no combustibles are stored. A lantern which does not burn well should never be put in order in the hay mow. There is a great temptation to strike a match and relight an extinguished lantern wherever it may be. It is best to even feel one's way out to a safe place than to run any risk. If the light is not kept in the hand it should be hung up. Provide hooks in the various rooms where the lights are used. A wire running the whole length of the horse stable, at the rear of the stalls, and furnished with a sliding hook, is very convenient for night work with the horses. Some farmers are so careless as to keep the lamp oil in the barn and fill the lantern there while the wick is burning. Such risks are too great, even if the buildings are insured."

all the different kinds we could procure. We received peas under nearly forty different names, but found that only about twenty of these were really distinct, so far as we could judge by the appearance of the seeds. A share of the varieties are cultivated in the southern states for the sake of the seed, but the majority are regarded as forage plants. We notice that some New York seedsmen offer the seeds of 'Whirlpool' and others which are esteemed in the southern states as forage plants. We know no plant more worthy of a careful test by those who practise ensilage than 'Southern Cow Pea.' Like other beans—for it is much nearer a bean than a pea—it should not be sown until the soil is well warmed and all danger of late frosts is over."

Neatness Around the Stables and Barns.

At this cold season of the year it requires considerable fortitude to keep the barn floors, the stables and the barn yards neat and clean. Oats, straw and rubbish of almost every description will, in spite of one, accumulate. Neatness in the precincts, as well as the surroundings, of the barns and stables is commendable at all seasons of the year, particularly in the winter time. The stock of all kinds will be a good deal better when the practice is observed, and those who are caring for or have charge of the stables and barns will be able to do up their work with more system and to better advantage than they would with the accumulation of filth at every turn they are obliged to make. It is just as necessary that barn floors should be kept neat and clean, as it is for a house floor, and the stable floors where the cattle are confined should be cleaned out daily with all of the regularity possible, naturally, most of the different varieties of stock are neat in their habits, and any one can see how much better they seem to enjoy clean and comfortable quarters, than they do dirty and filthy ones. One thing is certain, if a farmer keeps his barns and stables and his barn yard clean and nice, it may be set down that he is a good farmer. Another thing is equally as true: His milk and butter always finds a ready market at top prices, because those that wish to buy will know that the commodities are free from dirt. The fork, shovel and a good broom are three necessary implements at this season of the year. The barns, stables and barn yards will have plenty of use for them, and they should be in willing hands to use them.

Plea for Old Maids.

The good qualities of the old maid are too numerous to mention, but she has to bear the sneers of the ignorant, and of those too who think themselves very intelligent. They say "oh she is only an old maid, who is angling for a husband," but for all that, there are many who have landed their fish who would be glad to change places with the despised old maid. Some poor creatures are dragging out an existance borne down by the cares of matrimonial life, and ready to give up. But when weary let them go to some "secluded spot" "where stands the vine embowered cot" of some old maid. There they will be welcomed and the fairies will cast over them a beautiful spell, and they can rest and dream and forget their troubles. Having no husbands or children to care for, the old maid has more time to devote to her fellow creatures, and in times of trouble and sickness especially, her married sisters know how to appreciate her. Then what a help she is in the church, taking charge of many things and carrying them through too, and in many cases the minister couldn't do without her. Any community that has a staunch Christian old maid ought to feel honored. Like Queen Elizabeth it will be honor enough for me when I die to have written on my tomb: "Here lies Elizabeth, who lived a virgin and a virgin died." Let us all wish "Long life and prosperity to all good old maids."

Pretty Clothes for the Girls.

New York Evening Post.

Among the newest imported jerseys are those which are nearly covered with an elaborately beaded embroidery, either in black or with those irridescent hues, in odd Indian designs; which gives them a very oriental appearance. One very handsome style shows a black silk stockinet jersey embroidered with small stars in brilliant cut jet beads. A chenille drop and jet fringe finish the lower edge of the bodice. Sometimes, and generally where there is no braiding or embroidery on the jersey, collars, cuffs of velvet are now added to relieve the unusually plain appearance. These are invariably of the same color as the jersey.

Gauzes and tulles, so fashionable during the winter, will retain their popularity, and form one of the evening dresses par excellence the coming spring and summer. In anticipation of this, our leading importers are sending orders for new and beautiful patterns, samples of which they have already received. Among some very lovely designs are those wrought in gold and silver, showing morning glories, snow-drops, half open roses and buds, ferns, trailing branches of honeysuckle, and also patterns showing grounds of pale nun's gray amber, bronze, dark green and sapphire blue, strewn with scarlet carnations, pink azaleas, four-o'clocks, wild jessamine, trailing arbutus, and geranium blossoms in varied and brilliant colors. One new design particularly beautiful, is of white India gauze brocaded with golden roses and foliage, mingled with crimson sea mosses tipped with gold. These fabrics will be made up over low-priced satins of a shade corresponding with the blossom in the brocade.

Helpful Hints.

Mice disappear from shelves where camphor is kept.

Those whose hands chap on exposure to cold will find that rubbing them at night with mutton tallow is a curative operation.

For a felon, equal parts of gum camphor, gum opium, castile soap and brown sugar wet with spirits of turpentine, has sometimes been found efficacious.

Stale buns will be found greatly improved if they are dipped for a moment in cold water and then put in the oven for five or ten minutes. [illegible]

Collars and Cuffs.

I remember one of the loveliest women San Francisco ever knew—now dead these many years—who was celebrated among all their acquaintances for her collars and cuffs. She had found out some time in her girlhood that a bit of linen, snowy and shining, at the wrists and throat, was an indispensable aid to her peculiar complexion. No one ever saw her without it, save in full dress. The linen was always perfectly plain, of exquisite fineness and immaculate whiteness. At one time she left here for several years, living in Washington and European cities, but neither time nor travel ever caused her to change that fashion. She kept it to the day of death. It was astonishing what an amount of comment and admiration that one little peculiarity of dress created among the many gentlemen who knew her. It seemed to heighten her individuality and to add to the wholesome freshness of her appearance—two of the most fascinating attributes possible to woman. I believe she received more compliments, and was better known among the gentlemen by reason of her fine linen than was ever any other woman by reason of her fine laces.—San Francisco Argonaut.

Green-house and Window Plants.

As the sun becomes more powerful bloom will be abundant and plants will start into growth, and need more water. Ventilation can now be given more freely, especially to window plants. Insects will increase more rapidly and will demand attention. Those who give their window plants daily care are able to stop the first attacks of insects, and save much future trouble. Fumegation with tobacco smoke is best for the green-house, but is not easily practicable with house plants. For these showering with tobacco water is best.

Tobacco Tea.—Pour boiling water over tobacco stems, or other from of "the weed," and when cool dilute it to the color of strong tea; sprinkle the plants with it, or what is better, having the liquid in a pail or in a tub, dip the plants in it.

The red spider, because so small and not always "red," and living mostly on the under side of the leaves, is often an unsuspected cause of much injury to window plants. Moisture is the best remedy; go over the leaves, especially the under side, with a soft sponge, using very weak soapsuds.

The mealy bug, so called because it is covered with a mealy powder, is often a great pest. It is usually in the forks of the stems, and may be picked off with a sharp pointed stick.

Faded Flowers.—Flowering is very exhausting to a plant, and seed-bearing is still more so; as soon as flowers begin to lose their beauty they should be cut away before the formation of the seed begins.

Roses.—The stems that have borne flowers should be cut back to a strong bud, which will soon push.

Camellias, when flowering is over, will make their yearly growth rapidly. The plants may be given a warmer place, and will require more water.—American Agriculturist.

A Woman's Need of Pockets.

Mary L. Booth in Harper's Bazar.

If we were asked what is to-day the great advantage which man has over woman in the struggle for existence, we should answer, without hesitation, pockets. Pockets are the symbol of an orderly mind or logical mind, of logical powers, practical acquirements, homogeneity. A bag, a woman's bag, a shopping bag is the emblem of the kingdom of misrule. Speaking roundly, a man's clothes contain a dozen pockets, In this convenient place his change is kept, ever ready, and never in the way; in that receptacle are his knife, corkscrew and shoebuttoner; another compartment is sacred to his purse; still another holds his hankerchief; his gloves may have a seperate home if he will; his eyeglass lives in an aristocratic seclusion; watch, pencil case and toothpicks are comfortably segrated, and he has room, besides, for memorandum book, letters, newspapers, the new magazines, visiting card and a case of court plaster.

Is it any wonder that he turns the key of the world's great lock easily and well, having both hands free for that exercise? And the fact that he has conquered his pockets, so to speak, testifies to the supremacy of man. If his tailor demurred at putting them in, that useful minion would find his occupation gone. But when woman is told by her dressmaker that only one inaccessible pocket is to be allowed her, she supinely submits, and thereby proclaims her inferiority of sex.

The Hot Water Craze.

From the Philadelphia Press.

The irrigation of the human stomach by means of copious draughts of hot water has several pronounced advantages as a remedial agent. The ease with which water can be heated and heated water swallowed, when the knack has been fairly acquired, brings the remedy within the reach of the poor and the residents of regions remote from civilization and the corner drug store. But, as a matter of fact, it is among the wealthy, the high livers, the frequenters of clubs that the hot water craze cure takes, and it is they who take the hot water.

The Mexican News calls this particular periodical sanitay epidemic the "hot-water mania," and traces its origin to Sangrado, the patron of Gil Blas, whose treatment consisted in bleeding and draughts of warm water. The News says the physical effect of hot water taken into the stomach is to wash out that organ and prepare it for better work, but it warns the owner of the abused organ that too much hot water injures instead of helps; that it should be taken before the process of digestion is begun or after it is completed and that the quantity and frequency of the dose should be gauged according to the conditions of the case. This will be news to the city hotels, where cups of hot water are distributed among the guests with the regularity of sunrise.

The hot water craze will have its day and in its turn will give place to some other cure, new or old. In the meantime it would be better to remove the condition which drives the owner of the overburdened stomach to seek relief in his hot water cups.

King of Mashers Dethroned.

A New York letter to the Hartford Times tells how the "king of the mashers" has fallen from his royal state: "George Rignold, who was once worshiped simultaneously by nearly all the women of New York, has returned to America. He devotes the afternoons by standing in an alleged majestic attitude at Broadway and Fourteenth street. But the women pass him by. I wonder if any of them recognize in the red-faced, blear-eyed, flabby and slovenly-dressed man posing heroically on the corner the divine Henry the Fifth who crazed them all a few years ago at Booth's? Rignold's clothes are marvelous. They don't fit him anywhere. He has grown fat, but he still holds his nose in the air, purses his lips and wears the kingly look which has been photographed so many times. The effect now is that of a man who has been taking a sniff of particularly violent snuff and who is holding his head aloft from sensations consisting equally of disgust and a desire to sneeze. Mr. Rignold fell from a great height. He was once the king of those mysterious beings known by the title of "mashers," but he is now far without their ranks. He does not realize that he no longer possesses the charm which once made him famous."

A Reminiscence of Butler.

The bar of the supreme court met this week to eulogize the late Philip Phillips, who died a few weeks since. His widow is the woman whom Gen. Butler sent to Ship island for emptying a bucket of slop upon the coffin of a dead Union soldier at New Orleans, while the funeral cortege was passing her window. Although her husband took no part in the confederacy, his wife was a violent rebel, and after the capture of New Orleans lost no opportunity to insult the flag and the soldiers. After the war they came to Washington to live, where Mr. Phillips' abilities at once placed him at the head of the bar, and he is said to have been the most successful practitioner before the supreme court, receiving the largest fees and winning the most cases. Mrs. Phillips went a good deal in society, and at a reception ten years ago or so met Gen. Butler for the first time since she confronted him at his headquarters in New Orleans in 1863. Her escort, not recollecting the circumstance, attempted to introduce them, when the lady indignantly turned her back upon Butler, who, without losing his composure, quietly remarked: "Mrs. Phillips and myself are acquainted."

Canadian Railway Kings.

The railway kings of Canada are getting on fairly well for the limited country they live in. The magnates of the Canada Pacific who are just now pressing the people for several more millions to complete that road do not seem to stint themselves of anything in order to carry out their contract. President Stephen has just got comfortably located in his million dollar residence. It is built in Paladin style, the pillars that support the portico being wonderfully carved. The floor of the lobby is of three varieties of marble. The ceiling is of polished mahogany, as are also the window sashes. The walls are of polished Italian marble with paneling of Vienna marble, except the central panel, which is of Mexican onyx, polished until it looks like a jewel. The furniture of the waiting room is of rosewood with surperb carving. Mrs. Stephen's room is requisite in a set of furniture of cherry and satinwood which cost $20,000. The embellishments of the different rooms are said to be beyond description. The palace built by Mr. McIntyre is equal in every way to that of Mr. Stephen. and that of Mr. Angus is said to have cost more than either. These are the three chief men of the Canada Pacific who got $25,000,000 and 25,000,000 acres of land to build that road and are now asking the country to aid them further.

"They Never Come Singly."

Landsmen seem to think the weird stories and what are termed the "superstitions of sailors" fit subjects for ridicule and laughter. The fact is while some of these stories and peculiar notions may be wholly fictitious yet the majority of them are undoubtedly based upon scientific facts. For instance the writer has heard the statement that "three heavy seas are invariably followed by three lighter ones" laughed at a score of times and yet surfman know from actual experience that it is true and by taking advantage of this peculiarity of the seas have saved many lives. So the statement that one calamity is almost invariably followed by another of simil character may be called a foolish super stition, yet it is a statement which ha been corroborated in numerous instance both on land and on the sea. The re cent murders in the Town of Oyster Ba may be cited as an illustration. It ma be said that one murder or suicide sug gests to the vicious or weak minded desire to duplicate it, or that atmosphe io conditions which cause the wreck o one vessel are likely to wreck others.—[J. GERTRUDE'S RESOLUTION.

"No! I'll never marry. I've seen enough of wedded bliss!" declared Gertrude Meserve, with emphasis, shaking her pretty little head.

"Just wait until Mr. Right comes along," laughingly responded her friend, Lucy Evans.

"There will not be any such person, in this case," was the decided answer.

"Oh, no! Of course not. A certain young lady is so unattractive, and not a bit of a flirt either," said Miss Evans with mild sarcasm.

Gertie colored, and rolled her lovely blue eyes up at Lucy in a way that most people, men especially, found extremely fascinating.

"Now, Lu," she cried, "you're making fun of me, and I'm in dead earnest. I know it's all very nice to have plenty of beaux, other-wise girls would be obliged to lose many a good time; for how could we go to parties and places of amusement unattended? But as for being married, that's a different thing. Why, I don't know a single throughly happy wedded couple, and I don't believe you do, either!"

"Well," answered Lucy, reflectively, "I had never thought about it before, but I must really confess you are in the right."

"I knew I was!" triumphantly. "Now just let me name over a few of the girls who were schoolmates with us, and whose prospects certainly were fair. There's Annie Lawton—only been married two years, and her husband scarcely spends an evening at home with her, much less takes her any-where, and Annie always was the gayest of the gay. I don't see how she bears such neglect. Then Nettie Cummings, her husband already a notorious drunkard. To be sure, she had driven him to it by being that detestable thing, a married flirt. Lizzie Gerard—a confirmed invalid, to whom her husband's wealth brings little happiness. Florie Merton, united to a poor man, with a whole brood of little ones to bring up. Flo has to work hard enough now, if she never did as a girl. So I might go on ad infinitum. Bah! It's enough to disgust anyone with the whole subject. No! I'm an old maid, and I mean to stay one?"

"Not such a very old one," said Lucy, smilingly. "But seriously, dear, I think you are a little too harsh. I know I can trust my Horace," a tender light creeping into her soft eyes, and playing about her sweet lips, "and I hope he can trust me."

"I should hope so!" cried Gertie, giving her friend's hand a little squeeze. "Do forgive me, Lu! I ought not to have run on so, and you just on the brink of marriage yourself. Horace Vincent is a splendid fellow, and I've no doubt you'll be the model couple I have looked for in vain so long."

"And make a convert of you?"

"Yes; for I already am convinced that marriage ought to bring happiness. If it does not, wherein lies the difficulty?"

"If on the wife's side, ours shall not be a failure!" answered Lucy, a touch of noble pride and confidence in her voice.

"There comes Mr. Vincent, now," exclaimed Gertie.

"So it is," said Lucy, glancing eagerly out of the window.

Stopping only to fasten a few fresh flowers at her throat, she ran down to meet her lover, with a face illumined by happiness into positive beauty.

Left alone, Miss Meserve sighed audibly. "How full of joy she is," she murmured. "I declare it is enough to make one envious," roaming idly about, toying with the many knick-knacks which she already knew by heart, in a restless aimless fashion.

It was an inviting room, this of Miss Evans', exhibiting the quiet, refined taste of the young mistress in all its appointments. Of its two windows, one looked over trim fields and distant, wooded hills, to where the sunset rays painted the sky. The other looked straight down the broad, shady road which led to the heart of the dear old town. Coming up this street was a horseman at sight of whom Gertie uttered a little cry of surprise and delight.

"Rodger Magill! How splendid! I havn't seen him but once since he graduated from the medical school three years go, and went North to enter a hospital s house doctor. I wonder if he has btained a good practice yet. How ndsome he is!" as the gentleman dis- ounted. "Oh, dear, I don't look fit be seen," with a disgusted glance at er simple muslin. Aloud, "Cousin u, will you not play something for ?"

"Fond as ever of music, Roger?" inired Miss Evans, as she arose without ther urging.

"M yre so," escorting her to the splen- intrument in the rear of the long apartment. Then, with a courteous bow, he resigned his right in favor of Vicent, who began to select the pieces,' standing ready to turn for the lady.

"Dreaming?" murmured Magill, returning to Gertie's side, as he noted the pensive look in the great eyes.

"Building a fancy castle."

"Would I were its Prince Charming!" accompanying the words with an ardent look.

"Ah," mischievously, "but Lu was the princess."

"Then I resign all pretension," with another glance that brought the swift blood to Gertie's cheek.

She had ever been conscious of the wondrous magnetism of Magill's personality, which gave his presence a strange charm—nor was she the only one who had felt its power.

"Will you not come out into the garden?" said Roger, gently.

"I thought you were anxious to hear some music?" said Gertie, archly.

"I can hear just as well, and better too, through the open windows. Do come!" persuasively. "The twilight is so inviting."

Gertie hesitated—but how could she resist the magic of the pleading tones? Roger stepped through the low window onto the veranda. "Come!" he whispered. And Gertie followed him down into the fragrant garden.

"When did you reach home, Dr. Magill?" inquired Miss Meserve.

"Only last night, but I ran over almost immediately to Cousin Lucy's to beg her to keep my coming a secret, even from you."

"Why?" with some astonishment.

"Because I wished to surprise a warmer welcome than I otherwise might receive."

"Were you satisfied?" giving him a saucy, bewildering look.

"I shall be, if you will let your heart speak, Gertie!" passionately. "Darling. I only come back to ask you for your love; to win you for my wife. Three years ago, these words were trembling on my lips but I would not give them utterance. I had first to win, not a fortune, but an income sufficient to ensure you at least the comforts, if not the luxuries of your father's home. I have been successful beyond my ardent hopes. My position is an assured one. Oh, my heart's dearest, was I mistaken in thinking you could care for me—were my hopes too presumptuous? Gertie, darling! You love me, do you not?"

What a power, of pleading vibrated through the impassionated voice! What a wealth of tenderness lighted the dark eyes, intense with feeling! What a mighty love pervaded the man's whole being! How could any woman withstand such a torrent of emotion.

What a sudden shock, Gertrude Meserve awoke to consciousness of her heart's hither-to unsuspected, yet latent sentiment, and she trembled like a frightened thing.

Roger took both small hands reassuringly in his, and gazed lovingly into her shy face.

Fainter floated the music on the sweet-scented air, then ceased entirely. Deeper grew the twilight shadow. Gertrude heeded not. Her proud little head had found a resting-place. The haughty, beautiful girl was conquered, and content to have acknowledged her name.

"Well, Roger," said Miss Evans rising from the piano, "how did you like that last movement? Why!" in great surprise and bewilderment, "where in the world is Cousin Roger?"

Her lover smiled. "He and Gertie slipped away sometime since," he answered, "but I was enjoying your playing so much I would not interrupt you."

"Gertie will take cold out in this dew-laden air," exclaimed Lucy. "We had better hunt up the runaways."

"No need, for here they come."

"Will you ring for lights, please, Horace?" said Miss Evans.

"No, don't" laughingly protested Dr. Roger. "Let the dusk hide our blushes."

"Oh!" cried Gertie, under her breath.

"What do you mean, cousin?" said Lucy, peering first into his face and then into that of her friend. "Can it be possible," she added, "that my hopes are to be fullfilled?"

"Depends upon what they are," answered Roger, gaily. Then, more soberly: "As for me, I have won the dearest wish of my heart. The hope that has been my inspiration from boyhood is at last realized," drawing Gertie tenderly to his side.

Impulsive Lucy threw her arms around both. Then she burst out laughing. "I'm going to live and die an old maid!" she said, emphatically.

"What's that?" queried Horace.

"Oh, nothing." mischievously. "Ask Gertie."

"Some resolutions are better broken than kept," was the laughing, defiant reply, and a soft hand stole caressingly into that of Roger Magill.—Yankee Blade.

The Cloister.

The cloister was really the living-place of the monks. Here they pursued their daily avocations, here they taught their schools, they transacted their business, they spent their time and pursued their studies, always in society, co-operating and consulting, and, as a rule, knowing no privacy. "But a monk always lived in a cell!" I think you will be inclined to object. The sooner you get rid of that delusion the better. Until Henry II. founded the Carthusian Abby of Witham, in 1178, there was no such thing known in England as a monk's cell, as we understand the term. It was a peculiarity of the Carthusian order, and when it was first introduced it was regarded as a startling novelty for any privacy or anything approaching solitude to be tolerated in a monastery. The Carthusian system never found much favor in England. The Carthusians never had more than nine houses all told; the discipline was too rigid, the rule too severe, the loneliness too dreadful for our tastes and for our climate. In the thirteenth century, if I mistake not, there were only two monasteries in England in which monks or nuns could boast of having any privacy, any little corner of their own to turn into, any place where they could enjoy the luxury of retirement, any private study such as every boy nowadays, in a school of pretension, expects to have provided for himself, and without which we assumed that nobody could read and write for an hour.—The Nineteenth Century.

THE MORTGAGED FARM.

"Six o'clock!" said Marion Hilyard, looking up suddenly, as the tall, old-fashioned clock in the corner rang out its shrill announcement; "six o'clock, and oh! mother, here is Jenny Lane, punctual to the very moment. Now we shall have some good news from Jack, I hope." She ran out to the gate, flushed and eager to receive the letter from the country carrier, and returning seated herself on a low stool at her mother's feet and broke the envelope.

On the first glance at its contents a shade of disappointment dimmed her bright face. Instead of reading the note aloud she glanced hurriedly over the brief lines, and then silently, with a quivering lip, placed it in her mother's hand and turned aside to a window.

This was what Mrs. Hilyard read:

> "DEAR MADAM:—I saw your son a few days since, when, to my surprise, he expressed himself reluctantly to apply his money to the redeeming of the mortgage, saying that he required it for a speculation which promises to be more profitable to him than the holding of the farm. I have, therefore, been compelled to dispose of the mortgage to a gentleman of my acquaintance, who proposes to take immediate possession, and I consider it my duty to inform you thereof, in order that you may lose no time in making arrangements for a removal.
> "Very Respectfully, ABNER HARRIS."

Mrs. Hilyard returned the letter to its envelope with a trembling hand and a dazed, bewildered look, as though unable to realize the blow which had so suddenly fallen upon her.

Her eyes met Marion's and the girl, threw herself upon her knees by her mother's side, and burst into a passion of tears.

"Oh. mother, what shall we do? What will become of us?"

"The Lord will provide," said Mrs. Hilyard, raising her overflowing eyes to the motto on the wall, embroidered by Marion's own hand. "Where's your faith, my child, that it should fail you in the very hour of need?"

"Mother, it is not so much the loss of our home nor the poverty and trial in store which grieves me, but that Jack,—your own son, my own brother—should have so changed. Oh, mother, I know that our father in heaven will not desert us, but to whom on earth can we turn when even Jack can become worldly and heartless?"

At this moment a little blue-eyed girl burst into the room with——

"Mamma—Marion! here is Miss 'Melia Anderson at the gate with her buggy. She says will you step out a minute for she wants to tell you about old Mr. Millard being sunstruck; and she daren't leave her horse without some one to hold him."

Marion was in no condition to listen to 'Melia—the greatest gossip in the neighborhood, so Mrs. Hillyard, drying her eyes, was, in civility, compelled to see the informal visitor. Marion, her head resting upon the window sill behind the screen of clinging roses, could have heard every word spoken; but absorbed in her grief, she paid no attention until the name of Walter Hinton struck upon her ear.

"It's true for certain, for Maria had it from his own sister, Aggie Hinton. Says Maria in her wild way, 'If he comes back with all that money'—you know his Uncle Samuel left him most of his property last year—says Maria, 'If he comes back rich I mean to set my cap for him.' On which Aggie replies, "Oh, you needn't, for he's to be married before long to a real, nice pretty girl.' Of course, Maria wanted to know all about it; but Aggie only laughed in her mysterious way, until Maria says, 'I believe you are joking!' when Aggie replies, 'If Walter isn't married before winter I'll make you a present of my new earrings which he has sent me.' So you see it's certain, sure; and no doubt he'll bring his bride to visit his family, and then tell Marion we may look out for a grand party. When the Hintons undertake to do things, they always do it handsomely."

Marion stayed to hear no more. Gliding out of a side door she crossed the garden, passing little Myra, who was fondling a snow-white calf, her great pet and treasure, and who called to her to see how fast Snowball was growing.

Poor little sister! It would be as hard upon her as her mother and herself to leave the dear old home, with all the scenes and objects endeared to them by the associations of their lines. For in that ample, pleasant, old-fashioned farmhouse Mrs. Hilyard had been born and married, and here her children also had first seen the light.

Two years ago her husband—who had been too little practical to make a successful farmer—had died suddenly leaving his affairs in a very embarrassed state and the farm burdendd with a heavy mortgage. Then Jack, good son and brother that he was, had thought it best to go to the city, taking advantage of a situation offered him by a distant relative, until the mortgage should be paid.

Only two weeks ago he had written cheerfully that the matter would be specially settled to their satisfaction, and now, just as they were expecting to hear that their home was their own again, came this cruel letter.

As Marion had said to her mother, not even the loss of their home went to her heart with so sharp a pang as did this evidence of the change in her only brother. That Jack should have grown so worldly and heartless as to consider his pecuniary advantage before the gratification of his mother's comfort; that he should allow them to be actually turned out of the dear old house, and go and reside in the strange city, where they could never feel at home; oh, this was the bitterest pang of all!

So Marion had thought upon first reading that letter; and it was not until hearing Miss Melia's words to her mother that she awoke to the consciousness that fate would have even a greater sorrow than this in store for her.

One year ago she had parted from her accepted lover, Walter Hinton, in anger on both sides. Walter had become jealous and had spoken sharply to her, and in a manner which she considered herself justified in resenting. Walter was too proud to apologise, and Marion too proud as well as too delicate to make advances to a reconciliation; and so they had drifted apart, both miserable, until Walter had broken the last link by going out west.

She heard of him from time to time through his family, but no word or message to herself ever came. In all this while she had looked forward, with a faint, yearning hope, to the possibility of his some time returning, and of all being made up between them. But now this last hope was rudely stricken to the ground. Walter was going to be married. He had forgotten her and was lost to her forever.

"Oh, it is hard—so hard to bear!" thought Marion, as with hands tightly clasped, she passed slowly under the apple boughs of the old orchard. "Life is bitter. It has taken all from me; I can have no more to give. Only my dear, dear mother and Myra! For their sakes I must be strong and try to bear it all."

On the verge of the orchard, where the high bank sloped abruptly to the meadow, she came to a mass of tangled honeysuckle fashioned into a rustic arbor. Walter had made it for her, and here, in fact, it was that they had last parted.

Down in the meadow ran a little path by a short cut to Walter's home a couple of miles away. How often she had sat here of an evening and watched for him! She could scarcely look back upon any time of her life, or upon any object now before her eyes, which was not connected with some association of Walter. There was the walnut tree which he and Jack used to climb, and there the clear, laughing brook in which he had taught her to steer the little boat which he had made for her, laden with grain, down to Jack's famous water mill, at the roots of that old willow. Further up was the real "grist and saw mill" which Jack had always been so desirous of owning, and which everybody said would be such a good investment for one who could manage it properly.

And then Marion, seated on the bench in the rustic arbor, turned and looked long and yearningly, at the old farmhouse peeping from the great beeches across the orchard. No other place on earth could ever be home to her. And her mother! Oh, it would be harder still for her, whose whole life of 50 years had been spent under that roof!

A sudden sound aroused Marion—a sharp whistle as of some one calling a dog—and saw through tear-dimmed eyes the figure of a man hurrying along the pathway in the meadow. She drew back behind the screen of honeysuckle.

The path led past the arbor, but at the foot of the steep bank, and she would not be discovered in her retreat. So she thought, but a moment or two after there was a sound of footsteps ascending the bank, a rustle of the honeysuckle branches, and Marion saw standing in the entrance of the arbor the figure of a tall young man, who looked almost as much startled as herself.

For an instant they gazed at each other—Marion pale, and the stranger with a flush rising to his handsome face. Then he said as he held out his hand:

"Marion, don't you know me?"

She gave him her hand in silence. It was Walter. And suddenly with the sight of him came the full bitterness of her sorrow, in the consciousness that he was lost to her forever. She was nothing to him now, and he must be nothing to her.

"I am glad to have so unexpectedly found you here in this dear old spot," he said. "I arrived at home only an hour ago, and could not rest until I had seen you."

She met his eyes bent upon her with a strange earnestness, and her pale cheek faintly flushed; but she could not have spoken a word.

"Marion," he said suddenly, "have you no welcome for me? Is it possible that you cannot forgive me?"

"Forgive you?"

"Yes, for all my absurd jealousy and pride. I have never had a happy moment since I parted from you, Marion, and I have come back at last to ask your forgiveness, and to beg, too, for the love which I forfeited; but which I cannot live without."

"I do not understand you, Walter. I do not know why you should speak thus to me, when—when you are going to be married."

"Who told you that of me, Marion?"

"It came from Agnes, your sister."

He smiled.

"Aggie knows my wishes. It was she who encouraged me to come back. She thought you would forgive me. Will you Marion, darling?"

She had averted her face to hide her tearful eyes, but he now took both hands, and as he drew her towards him a great tide of joy rushed over her, and she could only faintly murmur—

"Oh, Walter!"

When they were both calmer she told of the heavy grief that had fallen upon them. They must leave their dear old home which had passed into the hands of starngers.

"Of strangers, Marion? Do you call me a stranger?"

"You, Walter?"

He looked surprised in his turn.

"Did you not know that it is I who have purchased the dear old farm? Did you not receive Jack's letter?"

"Oh, Walter, it cannot—cannot be true!"

He took from a pocketbook a paper which he opened and placed before her. It was the mortgage which the father had given Mr. Harris.

"And the place is really yours now?" she said, looking up radiantly through sudden tears.

"Not mine, but ours, darling."

She was too happy to speak a word in answer.

"You see dear," Walter said, "Jack and I talked it over the other day, and we agreed, as he was so anxious to purchase the mill and had not means sufficient for both, that I should take the farm, and leave him at liberty to invest in the mill property. It is the very best thing for Jack and for his mother, as I explained to her, if only she had received his letter. Jack is not fitted for a farmer, and could never have made much of the farm as he will certainly do with the mill. He came up with me in order to attend the matter. Forgive me that I neglected to inform you, but I left him behind in the maple field, talking with Aggie."

Marion started up with a glad cry. Coming down the opposite declivity of the meadow was somebody joyously waving his hand, and in two minutes she was sobbing in her brother's arms—from a fullness of joy of such as she had never in her life before known.

They hastened to the house, all three eager to gladden the heart of the mother.

Jack sprang up the steps and took her in his arms, while Walter lifted Myra, who had run to meet them in frantic delight.

As Marion crossed the threshold, the clock rang the welcome chime.

"Seven o'clock!" said the girl, softly, and went quickly up to her own room. As she passed the clock, she looked up at it with an expression almost of awe.

"What a lifetime of misery and happiness in one hour!" she murmured.

It is said that Senator Anthony, of Rhode Island attributes his recent illness to the use of cigarettes.

FARMERS' COLUMN.

Agricultural Notes.

Have a good wheelbarrow; it will save lots of lugging. Have a good grind-stone, and keep things sharp, so they will cut.

The dairyman who don't know whether a certain cow pays her way or not, is not a first-class business man. Every cow should have a record, and, if it is not a good one, make beef of her or feed her better,

From Jersey cows were sold by George W. Hoover of Urbana, Ohio, to W. H. Corning of Cleveland, for an average of upward of $1,000 each.

Have a good wagon jack; it will save many a hard lift, and if you get stuck with a load on, you can quickly oil up without unloading.

The New York state senate has ordered an investigation into the adulteration of dairy products. The manufacture of imitation butter has increased enormously, and this fraudulent article is sold by retail dealers for genuine butter. This is a grievance for which the farmers and dairymen have good ground to ask redress.

If you can afford the outlay put in a good windmill to do your pumping, and you will get larger dividends from it than a share of railroad stock will give.

Have a good stout pair of horses to do your work, and one to drive, if you need it; a good pair of heavy horses are better than four oxen for farms near the city, if not for others.

Eggs and National Wealth

One of the secrets of the prosperity of the French peeple, and their ability to bear even the heaviest burdens without giving way under them, is the extraordinary thoroughness with which they cultivate their farms, vineyards and orchards, and the profits which they contrive to obtain from the smallest and seemingly insignificant products. We find a fresh exemplification of this in figures lately published in an exchange exhibiting the extent and profits of chicken raising. There are in France about 40,000,000 hens, valued at $20,000,000. One-fifth are marketed yearly for the table, bringing about $4,000,000. The annual production of chickens is 80,000,000, worth in the city market $24,000,000, and $2,000,000 are added for the extra value of capons and fatted hens. The production of eggs is estimated at $40,000,000, $2.21 to every man, woman and child in France. The power to make much out of little, and to live frugally on small means, and with limited resources to fall back on, is the distinguishing trait of the French people, and one worth emulating.—The Husbandman.

The Poland China Hog.

In reply to a correspondent, we would say, we have never seen a better herd of hogs than the Poland China. They suit any condition or taste of any kind of a farmer. They mature early and can be ready for market at any age, or they can be kept until they become of enormous size. They are good breeders, and are docile. Their form and flesh is very acceptable to butchers or packers. And after all of the parade about certain other breeds being healthier or hardier, it is probable such things are only in the imagination of greedy dealers of fancy breeds. The Poland China have stood the test for long years against at least a dozen other breeds, and are yet the most popular hog raised or fed. And by careful breeding and improving we have no doubt they will be the universal hog when all of the other now pretended rival breeds will be forgotten. This is our opinion and no one need feel excited or depressed about it. It is only one man's opinion, and our saying may not create a serious revolution.—Des Moines Register.

Boiled Indian Pudding.

"M. V. N." wishes for a good receipe for boiled Indian pudding. She wishes it to be of ginger-bread color, and also of the kind which if all is not eaten the first day, it can be fried for breakfast. The following receipe is certainly a worthy one and fulfills all these conditions: Warm a pint of molasses, then mix a pint of sweet milk with it, beat four eggs very light, and add to the molasses and milk; chop one pound of suet very fine, and stir this in with enough Indian meal to make a thick batter. For flavoring use one tablespoonful of ground cinnamon, half a teaspoonful of nutmeg, and a little grated lemon peel. Dip a pudding cloth into boiling water, then sprinkle flour in it, pour the pudding in; leave room at the top for it to rise, then tie it closely. Boil for three hours; serve with any pudding sauce you choose. A sour sauce is generally preferred. The flavoring may, of course, be a matter of choice also; some cooks add a cupful of English currants, thinking that they improve the flavor.

Preparing For Spring in the Garden.

Whenever a crop is taken off, it will be a great gain to manure and plough or spade the land, leaving it rough during the winter. All such work as making paths, laying drains, etc., is more advantageously done now than when the press of spring work is at hand. If new frames are needed, or straw mats or crates for market produce, or garden labels are required; if implements are to be made, repaired or bought—whatever can be done in the present months—will save much valuable time in spring. Now, and all through the winter add everything to the manure pile that will decompose and increase its bulk and value. Among the preparations for spring is the picking out into cold frames the cabbage, cauliflower and lettuce plants from seeds. It is important to set the plants of cabbage and cauliflower down to the first leaf, so that the stem, the portion most readily injured by freezing, may be covered. The sashes should not be put over the plants until there is danger of severe freezing weather. Other frames should be made ready for very early lettuce. The soil is to be spaded and enriched and made ready for planting, and the frames then filled up with leaves. If there are shutters at hand to cover them, all the better. Earth is often wanted for hot-beds, seed boxes, etc., at a time when the ground is still frozen. Lay in a good supply of fine, rich soil, under a shed, or where it can be had when needed.—American Agriculturist.

Prevention of Pneumonia.

The New York Evening Post contains a valuable article on the above subject by Dr. David Wark, of which we give the substance.

Oxygen is the agent by which the food is fitted to repair the waste of the system, and is equally the agent whereby the effected matter is fitted to be removed by the lungs and kidneys. This agent, so doubly essential to life and health, is taken up by the lungs from the inbreathed air. The amount necessary is about equal to the amount of food.

In pneumonia, at its second stage, there is an exudation into some portion of the lungs. This speedily solidifies and completely fills up the air cells. So rapidly may this take place, that two pounds of such solid matter may be deposited in twelve hours, or less. Hence the reason why pneumonia is sometimes so quickly fatal. In case of recovery, this matter softens, is absorbed into the circulation, and eliminated by the proper organs, leaving the lungs unharmed.

If the worn-out material of the system ir more than the inhaled oxygen can prepare for removal, it accumulates, giving rise to various ailments, and is often deposited at some points where there is some local disturbance. It may be thus deposited in the lungs when irritated by a cold; but no cold can cause pneumonia unless there is undue amount of effete matter in the blood.

The old are predisposed to it from the changes which age affects in the lungs and chest walls; and so are the very young, from the undeveloped condition of their breathing powers, But the ease-loving, high-living, middle-aged gentlemen are liable to it from their habits of life; and so are the sedentary, from very different habits, but which equally keep the inbreathed oxygen unequal to the bodily waste,

A few minutes spent daily in exercise adapted to expand the chest would permanently enlarge its capacity, and enable the lungs to take in a corresponding increase of air—an increase, say, from twenty to sixty cubic feet a day.

How to Introduce People.

"I do dislike to introduce people to each other," said Eva to me one day.

"Why, pray?" I asked, "It seems to me a very simple thing."

"Well, when I have it to do, I stammer and blush, and act so awkward, I never know who should be mentioned first, and I wish myself out of the room."

"I think I can make it plain to you," I said. 'You invite Mabel Tompkins to spend an afternoon with you. She has never been at your home before, and your mother has never met her. When you enter the sitting-room, all you have to do is to say, 'Mother, this is my friend Mabel; Mabel, my mother.' If you wish to be more elaborate, you may say to your 'Aunt Lucy, 'Aunt Lucy, permit to present Miss Mabel Tompkins; Miss Tompkins, Mrs. Templeton.' But while you introduce Mabel to your father, or the minister, or an elderly gentleman, naming the most distinguished personage first, you present your brother, his chum and your cousin Fred to the young lady, naming her first. Fix it in your mind that among persons of equal station the younger are introduced to the older, and that inferiors in age, position, or influence are presented to superiors. Be very cordial when, in your own house, you are introduced to a guest, and offer your hand. If away from home, a bow is commonly sufficient recognition of an introduction, speak both names with perfect distinctness.—Harper's Young People.

Refreshments for an Evening Party.

A correspondent asks for information in regard to the refreshments she shall serve at a small party of twelve or fifteen persons. A few dishes, perfect of their kind, are much more satisfactory than a great variety less daintily prepared. Sandwiches made of bread baked the day before, and of nicely minced boiled ham, seasoned with a little vinegar and mustard and a few drops of oil, with coffee, for which genuine cream has been provided, may well come first; then chicken salad, with cucumber pickles and olives; after which serve cream, with two or three kinds of cake, and if you choose, grapes and oranges.

The oranges should be partly pealed and the skin divided in eighths, and the points turned over toward the orange itself, If this is done an hour before they are to be served the peel will keep its place. If the refreshments are served at small tables, at which two ladies and two gentlemen sit, two finger-bowls are all that need be placed there, immediately after they have indicated in some way that they have finished supper. At whist parties, where time is to be considered, it is best to use the small tables, so that those who have an unfinished game on their minds can complete it speedily, while it is still possible to remember that the jack or tenspot is now high.

Straw Hats and Bonnets.

The new importation consists principally of plain straws. Comparatively few fancy braids are displayed. Serviceable Milan braids and English Dunstable straw comprise the large portion of the new straw goods. Fine Belgian straws, which are as light in weight as a chip, promise to be extensively used this summer. Satin straws, which in their fine qualities closely imitate Belgian straws, will be chosen by ladies who wish a less expensive bonnet. The new straws that are imported are principally in solid colors. Every rich shade and delicate color of the cloth or cotton goods are reproduced by the French dyers of straw. A hat in the natural yellow tint of the straw is a rare thing. Straws in mixed colors are shown in fancy braids. The tubular braids of last season re-appear in mixed colors, and have a lustre like that of satin straw given them. Olive green bonnets are mixed with ecru, navy blue with gold color, and black bonnets with threads of irridescent steel. There are new bonnets in crochet-like loops, and the osier and basket bonnets of last spring are occasionally shown in mixed colors. Basket-braided bonnets of straw beading woven with cords of chenille, or bonnets of braided cords of soutache on stiff wires and satin or velvet ribbon, are shown among novelties.

Putting Summer Clothing in Order.

If the mother or head of the house is a wise woman she will begin now to put the every-day summer clothing in order. The stockings and underwear should all be looked over, and be put in wearing condition; then a little later the common dresses may be made or be made over, and so the hurry and worry that unfortunately often attend the coming of spring, may, to some extent, be avoided.

An honest woman confessed not long ago that although the minister whose church she attends, of which she is a member in excellent standing, is not at all liked as a preacher by many of his congregation, she finds that he is doing her a great deal of good. "I always listen to the text and the opening of the sermon," she said, "and after that his voice is so pleasant, and I am so sure that I know exactly what he is going to say, that I sit there, in that quiet and restful place, and plan out my work for the week, and I notice that when I do this I always get along so much better during the week, for that Sunday morning hour is about the only one that I have which is entirely free from demands upon me." Far be it from me to recommend this practice, but in view of the [illegible]ching, which so often is a "darkening of counsel," she may be forgiven, and certainly the idea of quietly planning out the week's work is to be commended.—New York Post.

Death of a Beauty.

A St. Louis account of the death of Mrs. Paramore, nee Nellie Hazeltine, states that she gave birth to a son on St. Valentine's day. All unconscious of her impending fate, and over-confident in the strength which had been her's all through her life, the young mother communicated the news of the coming of her little son to a number of her intimate personal friends through cards bearing these words:

Compliments of
Mrs. Frederick Wallace Paramore and son,
Born St. Valentine's Day, 1884.

These cards were received by many of the friends to whom they were addressed within twenty-four hours after the event had occurred. The cards were in Mrs. Paramore's handwriting, and the effort in writing them in all probability brought on the fever which caused her death.

She made her debut in society on her seventeenth birthday at a party given in her honor by her mother. From the night of her debut she took a front rank as a beautiful girl, and soon had the name of being the belle of St. Louis. The great social successes of Nellie Hazeltine are too many and too well known to need recounting. In her twentieth year she visited the Eastern watering places, and on Dec. 2, 1881, she was married to Mr. F. W. Paramore, son of Col. J. W. Paramore, president of the Texas & St. Louis railway. The wedding was solemnized in Philadelphia by the bishop of that Episcopal diocese, and was a brilliant affair. From the date of her marriage she lived quietly with her husband, but indulged in many social entertainments, notably the historical encampment at the armory and at a dramatic performance of the McCullough club. She was quite successful as an amateur actress, her fine elocutionary training serving her.

There have been many differences of opinion on the subject of Mrs. Paramore's beauty. Photographers vied with each other in reproducing her face, while artists vainly endeavored to put her features on canvas. As a girl she was tall and graceful, her figure being marked by square shoulders, a small waist, and the large, free limbs of an English woman. Her features were Grecian. Her face was oval, and her eyes, which were a deep brown, were large and lustrous. Her hair was her chief glory, being of the hue of burnished bronze, a golden red, or what is more generally known as Titianesque. She was very intelligent and possessed many accomplishments. Miss Hazeltine became known nationally by a report that Samuel J. Tilden had sought her hand in marriage.

An Affecting Scene.

An affecting scene occured in Hoboken, N. J., opposite New York City, while the remains of the Jeannette Arctic victims, under charge of a guard of honor, were awaiting burial. A lady in deep black, with a heavy crape vail concealing her features, and accompanied by an elderly gentleman, approached the guard. A word whispered in the guard's ear, and the rope was lifted up for the two to pass under. "There it is," whispered the guard, pointing to the great box, which contained the remains of Lieutenant De Long, and the lady walked quickly forward and flung herself upon it and sobbed convulsively for several minutes. The lady was Mrs. De Long. Her companion was her father, Captain James Wotten.

No Luck in Horseshoes

Jeems and family had the diagram of a horseshoe placed on every conceivable article of wearing apperal, household furniture and all untensils for use, when possible. "For," said Jeems, "it means good luck every time. It is a sure talisman." The next day after the monogram for G. L. was secured on all available places and articles, his wife fell down stairs and broke her arm, the baby was taken with whooping cough, the dog run mad, the servant girl lit the kitchen fire with naptha and went home, the horse ran away and smashed the carriage all to flitters and Jeems was brought home on a shutter, and last of all, the firm to which Jeems belonged went into bankruptcy. Jeems believes in horseshoes, he does.—Cambridge Tribune.

The business of Congress seems to be dragging along rather slower than usual, but the assurance is given that work in committees—the only places where there is much real work—is being attended to with a reasonable degree of industry and ability. The results will be seen at a late day. When legislations has been properly shaped by the committees, their bills, reports and recommendations, will afford interesting topics for discussions, and the daily proceedings may assume a livelier air. The sessions will probably continue for at least six months three of which are already past, and three will be ample time for a great deal of good, and a great deal of evil, legislation—as the case may be.

The course of England in presenting to the United States Government the Arctic steamer Alert to assist in the search for the Greely party is a very graceful act of international courtesy which will be warmly appreciated. The act is prompted in part by the recollection of the course of our Government when the English vessel the Resolute, abandoned in the Arctic regions, was recovered by American whalers, purchased and repaired by the United States and returned to Great Britain. The gift of the Alert is most opportune as well as graceful. The vessel is peculiarly fitted for the service being stanchly built and well able, as was shown by her record with the Nares expedition, to undergo the special hardships of Arctic navigation. Our Government would have esteemed it a privilege to purchase her, but the prompt generosity of the English Government cut short the overtures for purchase.

It is asserted with some show of credibility that Prince Bismarck's crusade against American hog products is prompted by a deep seated animosity to this country, and the facts that 195,000 Germans, enough to start a new city of the first class, came to this country last year, has made Bismarck cross. He does not know how to stop this drain upon the population of his country and is seeking, even at the risk of a rupture with the United States, to arouse among his people an animosity against this great and glorious republic. The hog business and the Lasker resolution of congress are alike exhibitions of his methods of counteracting the German tendency to come to this country and thereby escape his military rule. But the vast number of Germans in this country have become thoroughly patriotic Americans, and their intercourse with friends at home has served to leaven the whole German empire with American ideas, and it will be impossible upon any pretence to transform them into a condition of enmity to this country.

The papers in the Ohio valley have exhumed the following prediction of E Stone Miggins written to the Insurance Times on the 20th of last December: "The winters of 1884 and 1885 will be remarkable for the abundance of snow, for the descent of the snow-line far down toward the equator, killing the orange trees in Florida the week following the moon's conjunction with the sun, when the latter is over the tropic of Capicorn; for intense cold over the northern hemisphere; for volcanic eruptions in both hemispheres; for unusual floods in Europe and America of each year, and on account of the excessive moisture, the failure of the wheat and corn-crops in 1884 and 1875. Farmers, therefore, during these years, should raise those grains which best flourish in humid atmosphere." These predictions have had a certain degree of fulfillment this year, and there are many people who are inclined to believe that what is said of 1884 may come to pass, but it is well to recollect that Wiggins' prophecies have often been proved failures, so much so, that his name has become a synonym for humbug. People are very apt however, to forget the failures, when one guess as prophecy seems to be fulfilled, by the mere fact of happening or coincidence.

The report of the commission appointed to investigate the pork industry of the United States is emphatic in the denial that any conditions exist tending to the propagation of disease. Great care is taken to prevent the transportation of infected hogs, and examination proves that American pork is fully equal, if not superior, to that of France or Germany. While there are occasional cases of trichinosis, they are comparatively unimportant, and the disease is by no means general. From returns from railroad and transportation companies, slaughter houses, packers and shippers, confirmed by those from boards of health, humane societies and experts employed by the commission, it appears that the utmost care is preserved throughout that dead hogs are never transported except to offal rendering establishments; that diseased hogs are refused transportation; that humane laws and sanitary regulations exist at all stock yards, enforced by local inspectors under penalty, fines, etc., [illegible]

Death of a Great Defaulter.

Intelligence has been received of the death of Marshall T. Polk, ex-state treasurer, in East Nashville, Tenn. He had been ill for some days, but his death was unexpected. He was lying on the bed talking, as usual, to his family, having been up and down all day and apparently in the same health as for several weeks. Even his family hardly knew when he died. His son, James Knox Polk, saw his arm fall, and went to him and saw he was dead. Several physicans were called and pronounced it heart disease. He was part proprieter of large silver mines in Mexico, which it is understood, were recently sold to a New York syndicate for $1,000,000. A few days ago it was hinted that, through the wealth he would thus acquire, Polk could pay to the state the amount which he had taken.

A Million Fire Loss.

At Philadelphia, five fires occurred during the night of the 28th, and owing to the violence of the wind and the great distance between the various alarms, the firemen found much trouble in keeping the flames under control. The most disastrous was at the chemical works of Powers & Weightman, the largest of their kind in the country, which were totally destroyed. The loss will be over $1,000,000.

A Chicago special says: The all-absorbing topic in drug circles was the advance of 25 and 30 cents an ounce in quinine, caused by the destruction of the Powers & Weightman Chemical laboratory in Philadelphia. The jobbers there are very unsettled as to prices, but sales were made recently, at $1.65 and $1.70. Advices from the eastern drug brokers indicate that the market there is "crazy."

PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS.

In the senate on the 25th, a joint resolution was offered appropriating $100,000 for sufferers by the recent southern cyclones. The McPherson bill providing for the circulation of national banks passed—43 to 12.

The McPherson bill, as it passed the Senate, is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That upon any deposit already or hereafter made by the United States bonds, bearing interest, in the manner required by law, any national banking association making the same shall be entitled to receive from the controller of the currency circulating notes of different denominations in blank, registered and countersigned, as provided by law, and not exceeding in whole the amount of par value of bonds deposited; provided, that at no time shall the total amount of such notes issued to any such association exceed the amount at such time actually paid in of its capital stock, and that all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act be and the same are hereby repealed.

That associations organized for the purpose of issuing notes payable in gold, under the provisions of section 5185, Revised Statutes of the United States, upon the deposit of any United States bonds, bearing interest, with the treasurer of the United States, shall be entitled to receive circulating notes to the amount and in the manner prescribed in the act for other national banking associations.

Senator Harrison introduced a bill of great importance to soldiers and their widows. It provides a pension for all soldiers who served during the war of the rebellion in the military or naval service for a period of six months and were honorably discharged, provided they are now disabled.

The President sent to the senate the following nominations: Horatio C. Burchard, Illinois, director of the mint; Commodore William G. Temple, rear admiral of the navy.

Registers of Land Offices—Byron C. Tiffany, Grand Forks, Dak.: Alonzo H. Church, North Platte, Neb.; Edward S. Butler, Neligh, Neb.

Receivers of Public Moneys—William J. Anderson, Grand Forks, Dak.; William B. Lambert, Neligh, Neb.; Samuel W. Sherify, Los Cruces, New Mexico.

The Senate confirmed Frank C. C. Lord, collector of internal revenue, district of Nevada; William R. Wheaton, register of land office, San Francisco; Emanuel G. Swanstorm, receiver of public moneys, Duluth.

A resolution was adopted in the house for an inquiry as to whether the act of the Dakota legislature taking railroad property does not conflict with the organic act establishing that territory. A joint resolution was presented appropriating $30,000 more for the Ohio river flood sufferers. Bills and resolutions were introduced prohibiting foreigners from acquiring or owning lands in the United States; authorizing the coinage of silver dollars and fractions thereof under the metric system, gold metric dollars and other coins; establishing an inter-state railway transportation bureau for the regulation of commerce with foreign nations and among the states; appropriating $500,000 for persons made destitute by the overflow of the Mississippi river and tributaries. The pleuro-pneumonia bill was discussed, and Mr. Hatch of Missouri, a democratic member, ridiculed the Democrats for always following the wake of the Republican party.

A bill by Mr. Nelson, to provide for the examination and survey of the Red River of the North and Minnesota river, with the view of improving and connecting them with the navigable waters of the same, and to appropriate a sufficient sum of money therefor.

A bill by Mr. Washburn in the house to-day authorizing the construction of a foot, carriage, and railroad bridge across the Mississippi river at some point between Fort Snelling and St. Anthony's falls in Minneapolis.

A bill was reported to the house to-day providing for a civil government for Alaska; also a bill requiring Pacific railroad companies to pay the cost of the survey of their lands.

Mr. Raymond of Dakota introduced a bill authorizing the city of Aberdeen to purchase a quarter section of land near that city; also a bill granting to the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul railway company the right of way through the great Sioux Indian reservation; also a bill to create a new land district in Dakota.

In the senate on the 26th the bill for the relief of Fitz John Porter was reported favorably and made a special order for March 12. The bill which recently passed the house was referred to this committee which amended it by substituting the bill passed by the senate last session. By the terms of the latter Gen. Porter is simply placed on the retired list with the rank of colonel, and prohibited from receiving any pay, compensation, or allowance, prior to his appointment. In the house bill he is to retain "the rights, titles, and privileges held by him at the time of his dismissal from the army;" but thus clause is eliminated from the amended bill.

A joint resolution was adopted thanking the government of Great Britian for its gift to the United States of the steamer Alert to aid in the relief of the Greely party. The bill abolishing the military reservation of Fort Rice, Dak., was reported adversely and indefinitely postponed. The bill authorizing the construction of additional steel vessels for the navy was debated.

In executive session the senate confirmed: Horatio C. Burchard, Illinois, director of the mint; Eugene O. Fecht, Michigan, consul at Paso Del Norte; Daniel B. Dyer, Kansas, agent of Cheyenne and Arapahoe Indians, Indian Territory; Henry M. Lawton, Texas, agent of Indians, Guapard agency, Indian Territory. Postmaster, William J. Sullivan, Leon, Iowa.

In the house nothing but routine business was done, and the greater part of the day was devoted to the discussion of the pleuro-pneumonia bill.

Mr. Cox (N. Y.) asked unanimous consent for the immediate passage of the senate joint resolution expressing the appreciation of congress and the people of the United States of the generous act of her Britannic majesty's government in presenting to the United States the arctic steamship Alert.

Mr. Robinson (N. Y.) was on hand, however, to interpose objections.

On the 27th Mr. Blair introduced a bill to extend the time for the completion of railroads west of the Mississippi river to which grants of public lands have been made, which in good faith, are prosecuting the work of construction, without the forfeiture of such grants. The debate was participated in by Messrs. Jones (Fla.), McPherson, Hale, Cockrell and Beck. The latter criticised the management of the navy yards and referred to the statement of Admiral Porter, that on one occasion $80,000 had been charged to the wrong ship. He said no one could tell but what that money might have been given to Dorsey to take to Indiana.

In the house Mr. Phelps, of the committee on foreign affairs, reported back the Barnum resolution directing the committee to inquire whether the minister of any foreign power endeavored to nullify the effect of the unanimous resolution of the house by reflection on the honor and integrity of its members. The resolution was accompanied by a report stating that the committee made an investigation, but had been unable to obtain any information on the subject, and asks to be excused from any further consideration of the resolution. The report was agreed to without discussion, and the committee discharged from further consideration of the subject.

Mr. Bingham, committee on postoffices and post roads, reported adversely the bill to prevent the use of the United States mails to advertise noxious medicines, food and compounds. Laid on the table.

The house went into committee of the whole, with Mr. Cox (N. Y.) in the chair, on the pleuro-pneumonia bill.

Mr. Throckmorton moved to strike out the enacting clause of the bill. Lost—118 to 114. The debate continued all the afternoon, and was rather dreary. The consideration of the bill being concluded, the committee rose and reported it to the house. The first question was on the amendment striking out the fourth section.

Pending action, the house adjourned.

In the senate on the 28th Mr. Ingalls introduced a bill to remove the injunction of secrecy from the court martial that tried Gen. Fitz John Porter, in order that members of it may give the details to the public and testify to the case if called upon. The senate resumed consideration of the bill to authorize the construction of steel vessels, Messrs. McPherson, Jones (Fla.) and Miller taking part in the debate. [illegible]

Consuls: Max Weber, New York, Nantes; H. B. Trist, District of Columbia, Mozambique; George B. Clark, Georgia, San Luis Potosi. Cornelius S. Palmer, Vermont, associate justice of the Supreme court of Dakota; Byron O. Tiffany, register of the land office Grand Forks, Dak.; Samuel M. Sherfey receiver of public moneys, Los Luces, N. Mex.

In the house on the 28th Messrs Duester and Guenther spoke on the resolutions of the Liberal Union of the German parliament regarding the action of the house of representatives on the death of Herr Lasker, and declared that they, and not the words of Bismarck, reflected the true sentiments of the German people. The pleuro-pneumonia bill passed—155 to 127—after the quarantine section (the fourth) had been stricken out. The bill provides that the commissioner of agriculture shall organize a bureau of animal industry and appoint a chief thereof, whose duty it shall be to investigate and report upon the number, value and condition of domestic animals in the United States, and also the causes of contagious and communicatable diseases among them, and means for the prevention and cure of the same. He is authorized to appoint two competent agents, whose duty it shall be to report upon the best method of treating, transporting and caring for animals and means to be adopted for the suppression and extirpation of contagious pleuro-pneumonia. The commissioner of agriculture may expend so much of the money appropriated by this as may be necessary in paying for animals if it is deemed necessary to slaughter and in such disinfection and other means that may be necessary to extirpate disease, the authorities of the state shall pay one-half of the expenses of the cost of disinfection and care of herds of cattle. It prohibits the transportation from one state to another of any live stock affected with any contagious disease, and provides for the prosecution of any person violating this prohibition. Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars is appropriated to carry into effect the provisions of the bill.

In the senate on the 29th, Mr. Harrison, committee on territories, reported favorably the original providing for the admission of the territory of Dakota. Ordered printed and recommitted.

Mr Ransom of North Carolina committee on appropriations reported back adversely the joint resolution introduced by him last Monday and referred to that committee, providing for an appropriation to aid sufferers by the great storms in Southern states.

The joint resolution for appropriation to aid sufferers by the recent cyclones in the South was reported adversely, on the ground that local and state aid would suffice. The bill for the construction of steel cruisers was further debated, and passed by a vote of 38 to 13. Adjourned till Monday.

The president sent in the following nominations—Julius Stabel, consul general United States, Shanghai Postmaster—Rodney D. Wells, St. Louis, Mo.; James L. Stephens, Heckman, Ky., George W. Keebaugh, Huntsville, Mo.; James Hodkins, Appleton City, Mo.

In the house on the 29th, a sharp debate over the retirement of Gen. Alfred Pleasanton occured in the house. The report from the military committee was explained at length by Col. Bayne of Pennsylvania, who made a strong argument in favor of it. The bill contemplates Pleasanton's retirement as brigadier general, but the opposition manifested in some quarters compelled the friends of the bill to reduce the rank to that of colonel. This is what Pleasanton would be to-day were his name still on the army register. Pleasanton, the gallant cavalryman, is in the city, living in poverty, and is unable to provide for himself.

The postoffice appropriation bill was reported to Mr. Townsend and referred to the committee of the whole.

The house, at the evening session, passed about twenty pension bills and adjourned.

A Great Express Suit.

The Wells Fargo Express company has notified the Northern Pacific that they shall require cars and conveniences for doing an express business throughout the entire line of the Northern Pacific commencing March 1. The latter has directed its officials to eject all express matter from its trains belonging to the Wells-Fargo company. If the latter succeed by legal process in forcing the Northern Pacific to carry their matter, retaliatory measures will be instituted by the Northern Pacific Express company, by establishing express routes on railroads now controlled exclusively by Wells, Fargo & Co. There is great exciteme in railroad circles where the facts are know A hard fight is expected.

The railroad company, which had a mutua satisfactory contract with the Northern Paci Express company, will defend the latter's i terests as far as it is able. The officials sa the company will not refuse the Wells & Far people what they ask, but will insist upon gra ing the cars and conveniences necessary o upon terms which are equitable and just. is the intention of the railroad company to p ecute the matter to the utmost limit, and generally expected that testimony will be duced showing some inside history of exp concerns, and their manner of doing busin that will be particularly interesting to those terested in such matters.

THE HUDSON'S BAY ROUTE.

The Convention at Emerson developed one fact beyond a doubt,—the feasibility of navigating Hudson's Bay for at least six months during the year and now the question is will our British brethren take hold of and push the enterprise to a speedy and successful ending? If they are all possessed of the same amount of public enterprise as are the public spirited citizens of Emerson there can be no doubt but that they will. That the opening of a means of communication with Hudson's Bay means at least 25 cents per bushel more for wheat to every grower in the whole Red River Valley there can be no manner of doubt. In the minds of some, a question of the feasibility of the route exists and so there would if it was a fact that the bay and straits were known to be open all the year round. Cavilers have always picked flaws with every enterprise of public enterprise that was ever started and hooted it until it became a living fact and then these same cavilers were the very first to swing 'round with the wind and loudly proclaim the glorious accomplished fact with a triumphant "I told you so!" Witness the establishment of railroads, the building of the great Hoosic Tunnel, the invention of telegraphy, of electric lights, the telephone, and the wonderful and almost perfect self-binding harvesting machinery as well as hundreds of others too numerous to mention. This route is no more impossible than all of these other things were conceived to be yet they all stand to-day accomplished facts just as sure as this Hudson Bay route will sometime be, because Nature has planned it and Nature never makes mistakes. In the Divine economy of the Universe it is the law, already established, that the chief staple of man's diet,—wheat,—must be produced so cheaply that the poor may always obtain their daily bread. Water and air are free gifts to mankind and Nature has so planned the construction of this great wheat belt of the world that wheat can and ever must be produced at prices that will enable the wheat raiser to live as also the poor man who is to be the consumer, and if men will only recognize this great fact and act in consonance with Nature's plans we can yet produce wheat at a profit for at least one-half the prices we now get.

WATER TRANSPORTATION

is by far the cheapest means as yet devised for transporting our great cereal to the markets of the world, and in planning this great wheat belt Nature has made ample provision for the transportation by water, of every bushel of wheat that will ever be raised in the whole valley. Look at a correct map of this country and notice this fact. See the perfect system of water courses connecting, or very easily susceptible of being connected and one can soon be convinced that Nature has done her work well leaving nothing to be accomplished in establishing a perfect water system of transportation that cannot now be done by man. Take the heart of the Red River Valley for a starter and you will see how very easily the water courses between us and Duluth can be connected, giving us a direct connection, with the great chain of lakes Eastward to the ocean via the lakes and St. Lawrence River, and Northward via the Red Lake, the Red, Nelson River and Hudson's Bay. The time will come when this magnificent system will be comprehended and adopted. For the present a railroad from Winnipeg to Hudson's Bay will fill the bill sufficiently to answer all purposes, for the present ruling prices of wheat in the great marts of the world will amply allow of some railroad transportation. The signs of the times indicate that the day is coming when wheat must be produced so cheaply that it can be sold by the producer at a profit for at least one-half what he now gets. How do we know? Read the history of the progress of wheat raising from the time our fore-fathers used to plow with sticks and reap with the sickle, a small handful at a time; note the great progress that has been made the vast difference of cost in production and consider the fact that every improvement made has been met by an increasing demand for breadstuff to supply the rapidly increasing millions of human beings. If in the next century the advance is so marked it can easily be realized how those things can and must be done, and we can the more readily realize that we are yet in our infancy in these matters. In view of the great events of the past who is so bold as to dare to limit, the improvements for the future? Who shall dare to say "Thus far and no further shalt thou go!" This country is already so ar developed as to imperatively demand a cheap outlet for its principal ereal to the markets of the world and r lack of it our progress, if it does not etrograde will be at a stand-still until ich a route is established. The Hudon's Bay route will supply the need, ill fill the gap and will cause the dawn such an era of prosperity as she s never before reached, even as illiant and phenominal as has been r progress in the past. It is in fact e one thing now needed to complete he work which has been commenced and thus far so successfully accomplished and we earnestly trust that our British brethren will rise equal to the occasion and open up their great highway to the principal marts of the world.

The International Mass Convention held at Emerson on the 4th and 5th insts. was a big thing in point of numbers and interest. As we have just returned we have time to give but a brief outline, reserving a fuller report for next week. On Tuesday morning at 4:30 the delegates commenced arriving, at which time the Crookston and Fargo delegations put in an appearance and were conveyed to the Carney House, a fine large brick building that would do credit to any city in the Northwest. About 10 a. m. on Tuesday, Mayor Nash, with a committee of the hospitable citizens of Emerson appeared, to greet the delegates and tender them the freedom of the city. Very soon several sleighs appeared and the delegates were invited to take a ride around "The Four Corners," as the cities of Emerson, West Lynne, Pembina and St. Vincent are called. C. S. Douglas, M. P. P., invited the JOURNAL man to occupy a seat in his cutter behind his sorrel flyer, and we are obliged to confess that Charlie has a nag that takes the dust from but few ordinary buggy horses, to say the least. Mr. Douglas took us to every point of interest, including the great Emerson wagon bridge, which is now being completed at an expense of $350,000, which has the largest draw of any bridge in the Northwest, being excelled by but few on this continent. This bridge will be thoroughly protected by the time the ice goes out in the spring and is an institution of which the enterprising Emersonians are justly proud. After an excellent dinner at the Carney House the convention was organized at Opera Hall and the two days time was fully occupied in profitable discussion upon the subject matter in hand. We have but time and space to append the following resolutions that were unanimously adopted, reserving other items of interest for next issue:

1. Resolved, that the object of this convention is to secure the immediate building of the Hudson's Bay railway from the Northwest corner of Lake Winnipeg to Fort Churchill on Hudson's Bay, said railway to be built, owned, and operated by the Province Government, and in such way as to secure minimum rates of freight on exports and imports.

2. Resolved, that a railway extending from the north end of Lake Winnipeg to Churchill Harbor on Hudson's Bay would be a Commercial undertaking in the full acception of the word with an abundance of freight assured from the opening of the road.

3 Resolved, that it is a matter of vital importance to the farmers and to the inhabitants of the towns and cities in the Red River Valley that cheaper transportation to the sea board for their surplus products should be secured as soon as possible.

4. Resolved, that the natural highway for the exports and imports of the Red River Valley is by way of Hudson's Bay.

5. Resolved, that we regard the practicability of the Hudson's Bay route as established beyond all question, and that although an examination of the various channels in Hudson's Straits should be proceeded with that the construction of the railway northward should not be deferred pending such examination.

6. Resolved, that the opening of this route would in the opinion of this convention add twenty-five cents a bushel to the value of the wheat grown in the Red River Valley, and so enhance the value of farm lands and other real estate and add to the prosperity of all its inhabitants.

7. Resolved, that European immigrants can be conveyed to Manitoba and the Northwest more cheaply and advantageously by this than by any other route.

8. Resolved, that all the industrial interests of the Northwest would be stimulated and brought into great activity by the opening of this highway.

9. Resolved, that in Manitoba we view with alarm the prospect of continued burdensome taxation in the shape of duties on imported articles to meet the interest on the great public debt incurred to build the Canadian Pacific Railway, and insist on our right to acquire such cheap transportation as shall enable us the better to meet such taxation.

10. Reserved, that while we as Canadians do not desire political union with our neighbors to the south, we do express our conviction that close commercial relations with them and cheap transportation through our respective territories are to be labored for.

11. Resolved, that the interests of the inhabitants of the Red River Valley, both north and south of the boundary line, are identical, and that all should work together for the common good. That both Congress and the Dominion Government should be importuned to improve the channel of the Red River for steamboat use.

12. Resolved, that it is the right and the duty of the Province of Manitoba to extend its boundaries northward so as to secure a sea port on the Hudson Bay for its exports and imports, and that every encouragement and assistance be rendered to our representatives at Ottawa in endeavoring to promote that object

13. Resolved, that in the event of the Dominion Government refusing to extend our boundaries to the Hudson Bay, that it is the duty of the Local Government of this Province to purchase the railway charter already granted by the Dominion Government and proceed forthwith in the construction and operation of a line of railway connecting Manitoba with the seaboard at Hudson's Bay.

14. Resolved, that in the event of the Dominion Government refusing to extend the boundaries northward to the sea, and, in the further event, that a favorable arrangement cannot be made with the proprietors of existing charters for the purchase thereof, this convention favors the construction of the road as an act of supreme necessity.

15. Resolved, that in the opinion of this convention, the interests of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company will not be injuriously affected by the opening of the Hudson Bay route, but that the value of their lands will be increased and their general business promoted by means thereof, and the convention learn with pleasure that the C. P. R. Company will further the building of the road by any means in their power.

16. Resolved, that, in the present crisis of affairs in the Northwest, when it is problematical whether grain raising can be made to pay in the face of increased surplus productions of grain in Russia, in India, and other countries, it becomes a patriotic duty for those capitalists who hold a charter from the Dominion Government to build a line of railway to the Hudson Bay to renounce their right in favor of the Provincial Government.

17. Resolved, that the admiral of the North American Squadron be requested to cruise with his fleet in Hudson's Bay this summer, to obtain information as to the navigation of the Bay and Straits.

18. Resolved, that a committee of three persons, to-wit: C. S. Douglas, M. P. P., Henry Tennant, M. P. P., and Mayor Nash, be hereby appointed to wait upon the Provincial Government and urge them to present to the Local Legislature an Act whereby the above resolutions can be carried out, said Act to provide for the appointment of five commissioners, two to be appointed from Winnipeg, one from Portage la Prairie, one from Brandon and one from Emerson—to apportion yearly among the different countries of the Province the sum to be raised to pay the interest on the cost of the road, and to secure its payment into the Provincial treasury by a set day in each year and also to make the contracts for the road and to operate the same.

Farm Notes.

SORE SHOULDERS IN HORSES.

Farm horses are most liable to have sore shoulders in early spring, when unaccustomed to work. If humanity does not lead to care in prevention and cure, interest will prompt it for certainly a horse with sound shoulders will do more work than if these be swollen and lacerated—Prevention is better than cure. The first point is to secure good, well-fitting collars, those of soft leather, of equal hardness on both sides. Many collars are stuffed more solidly on one side than the other, and should be rejected. The horse should be fitted to a collar at the shop, as two very seldom have shoulders exactly alike. I have often wondered that farmers do not have collars made specially for each horse. The cost would be amply repaid as it is slight compared with the increased service that would thus be secured I prefer a collar stuffed with hair. The leather should be kept well oiled, especially where meeting the shoulder. Pure neat's foot oil makes the leather soft and pliable, and is a good preventive and cure for sore shoulders. Cloth collars are now made, and cloth pads to cover the entire collar face. I know they are good and recommend them to other farmers.

Early in the spring, at least two weeks before plowing commences, begin bathing the shoulders of each work horse with strong salt brine. I keep in the stalls an old fruit can, and a rag tied to the end of a cob; and it takes but a moment to throw in a handful of salt with some water, stir it up and apply the brine. It toughens and hardens the skin and cools it, allaying inflammation. I do this each evening: after work begins I first wash off the shoulders with clean water I have never been troubled with sore shoulders since I have taken to carefully selecting collars, keeping them soft with oil, and bathing frequently with the salt water.

The best cure for sore sholders is rest, and this may be secured without stopping work, by removing the pressure from the irritated spot. One method is to cut a long, narrow slit in the hame groove opposite the soreness, remove part of the stuffing and make a little depression by pounding the face over the sore. The slit will not injure the collar. Another method is to use pads above and below the tender spot, to keep off the pressure After considerable experience I consider the best pad one made by stuffing a coat sleeve with hay, about one inch thick between the collar and shoulder, but thinner where it passes under the hames. Hay works into lumps less than rags, hair or wool, and is elastic enough to spring the collar from the shoulders when the draft slackens, giving them opportunity to cool and rest. —J. M. Stahl, in the American Agriculturist for March.

BUTTER AND CHEESE IN MINNESOTA.

Farmers Tribune.

From statistics gathered in answer to circulars sent out by Statistical Agent Young, we learn that there are sixty-eight creameries and eleven factories in the State and of this number, thirty four, just one-half the entire number, furnished a report of their production. While eight more responded that they were not able to furnish the figures required. The following table shows the location, together with the amount of the product and what it sold for:

The publishing of such statistics will prove highly beneficial, and be the means of attracting immigration from the older dairy States, where land is so high that dairying cannot be carried on so profitably as it can upon the cheaper lands of this State.

SHOWN BY OTHER FIGURES.

No returns were received from the creameries of St. Charles, Owatonna, Farmington, Madelia, Redwood Falls and Marshall—owned by Lawrence, Strobelt & Co. The proprietors say in Ohio, and reference to their books is impossible. These six creameries—made at least half the butter produced in Southern Minnesota. The creameries—outside of Rochester creamery—made at least half the butter produced in Southern Minnesota. The creameries at Mankato and Fairmont also failed to report. If the figures from these eight establishments were included, the totals would be very largely increased. A low estimate of the production would be 200,000 pounds, which at 24 cents per pound, would amount to $40,000. There is also a large amount of dairy butter made by the creamery process; but not included in the regular creamery statistics. At Madelia alone 180,000 pounds of this dairy butter were sold, at an average price of 20 cents realizing $20,000. In Olmsted County—outside of the Crescent creamery business as noted—there were 500,000 pounds of creamery and 200,000 pounds of dairy sold, and 55,000 pounds of cheese. If reports from the twenty-six creameries in the State, of which no mention is made here, were available, it would demonstrate that Minnesota is fast taking front rank as a butter and cheese producer. Reliable figures from thirty-four creameries, and estimates of eight others, however, give one an idea of the immense magnitude of this most important industry.

During the past summer and fall the editor of this department had opportunity of seeing many samples of butter from the creameries, and he does not hesitate to state that it was of excellent quality, comparing favorably with the celebrated Elgin brand. It ought not to be difficult to convince people that Minnesota has all the requisites for making one of the best dairy states in the Northwest, both for butter and cheese, and we are of the opinion that eastern farmers who are seeking cheaper lands will soon realize this fact.

A MINNESOTA DAIRY.

M. H. Lamb of Alma City. is one of the Minnesota dairymen who appears to be conducting his affairs in such a manner as to make the most money out of the venture. In a letter to the editor of this department, the writer says, enclosed you will find a statement of the amount of butter made by us. It may not look to you as being large, but it may serve to awaken some Minnesota farmer, who thinks that none but the rich can accomplish anything in the dairy business. Here is the statement:

From January 1, 1883, to December 13th we made 4800 pounds of butter, sold at an average of 27½ cents per pound; worth net, $1322.47½; number of cows, eleven; number of 2-year-old heifers, eleven. Average number of pounds of butter per cow, two hundred and ninety-one and two-fifths pounds. Average yield per cow, $70 14-100. We have before attended to this dairy and are gratified at being able to give the results. We believe the herd is grade Jerseys, and the figures demonstrate what one Minnesota farmer can do, and we give them by way of encouragement, and hope we may have many other reports from private dairies. Mr. Lamb was formerly a grain farmer, and we venture to say that in the days of the largest and best crops he never received so much net cash from his farm. Dairying does pay in Minnesota.

THE HUDSON BAY NAVIGABLE.

Grand Forks Herald: In speaking of the proposed new route to Europe by way of the Red River and Hudson's Bay, the Toronto Evening Telegram suggests that the question to be settled before a railway is built from Winnipeg to the shores of Hudson's Bay is the navigability of the bay and strait during the winter months. Opinions on this point are widely divergent. Some authorities say that, owing to the ice, navigation can only be counted on for four month in the year; others say six months, and others take the ground that as the ice that forms in the bay and strait is what is called field ice, navigation could be kept open the whole year round. It is somewhat of a reflection upon the country that it has within its borders a sheet of water larger than all our inland lakes combined and knows so very little about it that it is unable to say whether it is open for navigation the year round or only half the year. We shall probably discover the facts bye-and-bye, however, as a sum has been placed in the Dominion estimates to equip an expedition to explore the bay and strait and ascertain their navigability during the autumn and early winter. If they are proved to be navigable for a sufficient length of time during the year to enable the farmers to ship their wheat to Liverpool, it will make an immence difference to the Northwest. Railways will be built from Winnipeg and other cities to the shores of Hudson's Bay, and a rail and water route opened up that will be something like eight hundred miles nearer to Liverpool than by any other route. Everything depends on the length of time the bay and strait can be safely navigated by vessels laden with grain.

Economical "Making Over" Things.

Many families have a knack of making a little go a great ways, in rendering their homes comfortable, even genteel. Calling upon such a family recently, I at first supposed they had bought some new chairs, but on closer examination found they had been caneseated walnut ones, too valuable to throw away after the bottoms had given out. The girls had tacked on firmly some strong canvas in place of the cane, then added several thicknesses of the same size cut from an old quilt, and tacked over these stout cotton to hold them in place. A strip of cretonne having stripes of pretty flowers, was stitched across a piece of reps, and formed the covering. When this was tacked on, the edge was hidden with upholsterer's braid fastened with brass-headed nails. The effect was very satisfactory. After the boys oiled the frames, those chairs were really prettier than many expensive ones I know of. An old lounge, previously covered with hair-cloth, was treated in the same way, with the addition of a sofa cushion nicely embroidered. It is as good as new, and more attractive than it was previously.—The daughters showed me their "new carpet," made of two others. For the center an old sitting-room ingrain carpet was washed, colored brown, and the best portions sewed together. The border was formed from the best parts of a crimson and black bed-room carpet. The effect is more pleasing, to me at least, than a two-dollar-a-yard, bright-flowered carpet which another neighbor had just laid down.—E. E. Rexford, in American Agriculturist for March.

KINDLING IN PAPER BAGS, ETC.

Calling one day by chance at the humble but pleasant cottage of a co-worker of by-gone years, the writer was welcomed to the "Prophets' Chamber," which we almost feared to enter on a cold night, after many chilling experiences in "spare-rooms." In this plainly but neatly furnished chamber is a small but ample stove, a box of pine wood behind it, a few hardy plants by the window on an easily moved support; half a dozen inconspicuous but strong hooks or pins, very convenient for hanging up one's clothing on when retiring, and so on.

But the new thing to the writer was found inside the wood-box. The paper bags brought from the grocers had been preserved, and some of these, holding one to two quarts, were filled with shavings, bits of wood and chips, and the open ends twisted together, or tied with a bit of thread. So on this cold morning it was only necessary to spring out of bed, place one of these filled bags in the stove, throw in a few sticks of wood, touch a match to the end of the bag, and back to bed again—all done in less than a minute. In quick time a warm room was ready for dressing in entire comfort. A dark enameled kettle on the stove, found ready filled, soon changed the temperature of the half frozen water in pitcher and wash basin. Before leaving said room, we wrote this item, partly in gratitude, but more for the benefit of tidy housekeepers, who desire a convenient mode of keeping kindlings in a chamber, or elsewhere, without the usual litter.—Orange Judd, in American Agriculturist for March.

Hon. B. Sampson has returned from his trip to Washington and reports the prospects for the passage of the Nelson Bill very favorable. He says that Mr. T. B. Walker's opposition to the bill was solely on account of the limited time for taking out the pine and that that section was eliminated and then Mr. W. withdrew his objections. He says that Col. Plat B. Walker (Mr. Walker's brother) opposes the bill in toto and uses the weight of his influence against it. Mr. S. gives as his reason why he did not take steps for an appropriation for the improvement of the Red Lake River he was afraid it would militate against the Nelson bill and might defeat it. He states that he has secured the re-opening of his land case (involving the title to the land known a Sampson's Addition) which case will have to go before the land office again. Since his return he has noticed that Senator Sabin has introduced Nelson's bill in the Senate, and as almost all of our Minnesota delegation favor the bill, and as it has a host of friends outside. Mr. Sampson thinks that it will be very sure to pass both houses without a doubt if our delegation remain true to their pledges, and that he (Mr. S.) has friends there who are watching our delegation to see that they do their duty, and that we may look for the early opening of that magnificent tract and the acquisition of that valuable pine which means cheap homes and cheap pine for the settlers of Polk County.

Devils Lake Press: Saturday night Deputy Sheriff Ferguson arrested Harry Becket on a warrant sworn out by McGhee charging him with stealing between $250 and $300 from him. The case came up before Justice Bennett, Monday; Magee & Morgan appearing for plaintiff and Attorney J. V. Brooke for the prosecution. The case was adjourned until Tuesday, when the testimony was taken, and argument made. The accused was bound over in conditional bonds of $250, which he failed to make, and is consequently languishing in the bastile. The prisoner is one of the gang of variety actors who struck the city some weeks ago in their normal condition, that of financial wrecks.

WHITE EARTH AGENCY, Minn.
February 14th, 1884.

Sealed proposals for the sale of dead and fallen logs cut by the Indians on Red Lake and White Earth Indian Reservations will be received at this Agency until Monday the 24th day of March 1884 at 12 o'clock noon at which time the bids will be opened. The logs located at the following points on

Red Lake Reservation.

About 400,000 feet in 2 camps located on Clearwater Lake. About 600,000 feet in 3 camps located on Clearwater River below Clearwater Lake. About 150,000 feet in 1 camp located on "Four Legged Lake" River about 5 miles from junction of the Clearwater River. About 600,000 feet logs in 3 camps located on Sandy River about 3 miles from the outlet of Red Lake. About 200,000 feet logs in 1 camp located on Red Lake about 10 miles from outlet. About 200,000 feet logs in 1 camp located on Red Lake about 10 miles from outlet.

White Earth Reservation.

About one million feet logs located on Clearwater River about 6 miles from its source. About one million feet logs located on "Walker's Brook" a tributary of Clearwater River.

The terms of this sale is, that all bids must be accompanied with a certified check upon some reliable bank for at least one dollar ($1.00) per thousand feet as an assurance of good faith, the same to be returned to the unsuccessful bidder or bidders depositing the same when the bids are opened.

These logs to be scaled by the state surveyor whose measurement shall be considered final. Twenty-five (25) per cent. of the worth of the logs purchased will be required to be paid in to me within ten (10) days from the acceptance of the bid or bids and the remainder within thirty (30) days.

The Agent claims the right to reject any or all bids as may seem best for the parties for whom the logs are sold. Mark on outside envelope "bid for logs."

The Emerson International gives us the following facts relative to the recent International convention held at Emerson March 4th and 5th:

Soon afternoon the Opera House began to fill up with delegates and people from Emerson, Pembina and St. Vincent and farmers of the surrounding country, so that at two o'clock, the hour for opening the convention, the Opera House was well filled, with a good sprinkling of ladies in the gallery, which had been reserved for the fair sex.

The interior of

presented a very cheerful and pleasing appearance. Coils of bunting of various colors depended from the centre of the ceiling and stretched to the corners of the room, and were also looped along the walls. On the front of the gallery hung a large streamer on which was emblazoned in large, fancy letters the word "Manitoba," and on the left and right walls of the hall respectively, there hung streamers bearing the words "Dakota" and "Minnesota." The stage was handsomely decorated. A temporary railing was erected at the front of the stage and it was covered on the right side as far as the centre with red fabric from the face of which shone appropriate inscriptions in letters of silver, while the left side as far as the centre was covered with fabric of a blue color from which shone inscriptions in letters of gold, making a pleasing contrast. The inscriptions were as follows: "North to the Salt Sea;" "Down Goes Freight, up Goes Wheat;" "No Railway Monopoly;" "Protect the People from Railway Tyrants;" "Give us a Provincial Government Railway." In the centre of the railing was a drawing in pencil of two hands clasped together, and flanked on each side by miniature American and English flags, indicative of the relationship between Manitoba and the people of the south, and also of the character of the convention. At each corner of the proscenium was a picture of a large ocean steamship, and the walls to the right and left were adorned with the mottoes: "Vox Populi, Vox Dei," and "The Hudson's Bay is God's Highway."

THE ORGANIZATION.

Shortly before 3 o'clock, Mr. Douglas, M. P. P., asked the meeting to come to order, and after remarking that the object of the convention was so well known that it was unnecessary to state it, stated that it had been decided that instead of electing a temporary chairman the convention should proceed at once to organize permanently by electing a president and vice presidents from each of the towns represented by delegates, and for that purpose he would move the following:

President—Mayor Nash, of Emerson. Vice-Presidents—Senator H. Steenerson, Crookston; A. C. Batchelor, Fargo; Capt. Griggs, Grand Forks; Capt. Alsop, Moorhead; Hon. N. E. Nelson, Pembina; Mayor McDonald, Portage la Prairie; D. F. Brawley, St. Vincent; Hon. H. J. Clarke, Winnipeg; A. H. Vaughn, Selkirk.

Mr. J. H. Bell having seconded the motion, it was put and carried unanimously.

Mayor Nash addressed the meeting briefly, referring to the importance of the convention, and welcoming the delegates present from the various towns in the Northwest.

Secretary Cole read telegrams and letters from Winnipeg, Portage la Prairie, Grand Forks, Crookston, Pembina and other places announcing the appointment of delegates.

Among others a telegram was read from Hon. Mr. Norquay, regretting that he could not be present owing to his time being fully occupied in preparing for the approaching session of the legislature.

A telegram from Wm. H. Brown, esident of the Grand Forks Chamber Commerce, was read, as follows: At meeting of the Chamber of Commerce re on Saturday the following were sen as delegates to your convention: ot. Alex. Griggs, Maj. Hamilton, Dr. lins, Col. E. Smith, John Zerfass, gton Porter, G. B. Clifford, W. J. Anby, Sheriff Jenks, F. J. Bennett, A. Geyer, J. S. Eshelman and J. W. [illegible] and myself. Five or six of the [illegible] will be present.

[illegible] Brown, Capt. Griggs and ers left via the Grand Forks extension the St. P. M. & M. Railway for Neche, ecting to drive across the country to [illegible], but the train being delayed on the road and not fancying the drive, all returned home except Mr. J. S. Eshelman [illegible] on with Colonel Plummer, [illegible] of the Fargo Republican.

A VOICE FROM KITTSON COUNTY.

The following from Capt. Donaldson, [illegible] mammoth farm at Ken[illegible] on the St. P. M. & M. [illegible] County, Minn., was read: [illegible] Minn., March 4, 1884. [illegible] Emerson Convention: [illegible] the people in the north half of Kittson County are heartily with you in any effort that will give us a better market and cheaper freights for our grain. If the Hudson's Bay road is built and it will give us five cents per bushel more for wheat, I will build an elevator on Red River and give you half a million bushels of wheat each year.

Very respectfully,
H. W. DONALDSON.
Sec. and Man'g'r. Kennedy L. & T. Co.

THE DELEGATES.

The following places were represented at the convention by the gentlemen named:

Fargo—A. C Batchelor, T. S. Quincey and Col. Plummer, editor of the Fargo Republican.

Moorhead—Capt. Alsop.

Crookston—Hon. Halvor Steenerson, E. M. Walsh, Sheriff Zwickey and H. E. Cooke, editor of the POLK COUNTY JOURNAL.

Grand Forks—J. S. Eschelman.

Pembina—Geo McTavish, J. G. Webb, T. E. Yerxa, L. E. Booker, Hon. N. E. Nelson, T. W. Gaffney, G. H. Megguire, J. V. McIntyre, C. J. Brown, H. R. Vaughn, F. A. Wardwell, Hon. Judson LaMour, W. J. S. Traill, Capt. B. H. Webster, Lee Scribner, Jos. Daniels, Wm. Mason, James Langton, and R. H. Young, editor of the Pembina Pioneer-Express.

St. Vincent—D. F. Brawley, Sheriff Van Strum, C. E. Gooding, Mr. Lawrie, and W. G. Kitchell, proprietor of the St. Vincent Herald.

Hallock—Dr. Demers and C. G. Kelso, proprietor of the celebrated Bell-Kelso Farm.

Selkirk—A. H. Vaughn, Adrian Nelson and Dr Colclough.

Winnipeg—Hon. H. J. Clarke and W. A. Collins.

Portage la Prairie—Mayor McDonald.

Morris—Geo. C. Wilde.

Dominion City—D. Philips.

GETTING TO BUSINESS.

Mr. W. N. Fairbanks moved the following:

Resolved, that the object of this convention is to secure the immediate building of the Hudson's Bay railway from the Northwest corner of Lake Winnipeg to Fort Churchill on Hudson's Bay, said railway to be built, owned, and operated by the Provincial Government, and in such way as to secure minimum rates of freight on exports and imports.

Mr Fairbanks said that, with a view to show the progress that had been made in the matter of securing a route northward to the seaboard for the surplus products of the Red River Valley, he would read a report of a public meeting held in Emerson seven years ago to promote the undertaking. At that time very conflicting views were held as to the feasibility of the route, both as to the railway and as to the navigation of the bay and straits. He said that the committee appointed at the first meeting had made every effort to secure information and stimulate others to do the same, and he thought that their labors had not been in vain, and to-day he was happy to state that the matter of feasibility was a settled one, and that two chartered companies, each with large capital, were contending as to which of them should build the road. He said that the lands of the valley had been rapidly brought under cultivation, but that no cheap route to the seaboard existed to-day for the grain raised by the farmer. Wheat being a bulky article would not bear long transportation by railway if the farmer was to have anything for his labor. And the farmer of the present day demanded a reasonable profit or he would cease to cultivate the land in that country where he was denied it. He favored the building of the road to Hudson's Bay, to start from the northwest corner of Lake Winnipeg to secure the connection there, at a future time, with railways running to the south and west. He thought that the mouth of the great Saskatchewan might be the most eligible point to start from, as the river would furnish business to the road, and a supply of coal from the mines now opened both for the locomotives and the steamships that would run to Port Churchill. He said the promoters of the convention did not propose to start the railway from Emerson or from Winnipeg, but from such a point as would be equally advantageous for all sections of the province, and thus bring into harmony all its people. The resolution favored the building, owning and operating of the road by the Provincial Government so that it might carry freight at the lowest paying rate, and serve as a regulator of rates on other roads. This involved of course direct taxation to pay the interest on the money expended previous to the road coming into operation (say a period of two years) after that he presumed the road would earn enough to pay its way and relieve the people of taxation on its account. So far as a direct tax was concerned it made little difference whether the farmer paid the money to the provincial treasurer or to the treasurer of an existing monopoly. They must remember that Mr. Van Horne had power to take five cents a bushel, or other sum, from the farmer on his whole crop each year. Such power could not be otherwise than tyranical and farmers should not be subject to it. He was opposed to a private company building the road, with the provincial, or other government to control the rates. That has been tried in England and elsewhere, and has not been found to work well. In a partnership the private company would out general the government and have its own way as to rates of freight. The members of the government themselves are not railway men, and if they appointed a salaried man to look after the matter, perhaps the private company might add to that salary, and then—— In America we have not many instances of governments owning and operating railways, but in the countries of Europe this method is followed and with good results. In Belgium where the government owns all the railways, freight is carried cheaper than in any other country of Europe, and no complaints are heard. The leading canals in Canada and the United States are owned by the government, and are well managed. Why not [illegible] the centralization and consolidation of the railways in our own country and in the United States in the hands of a few great capitalists, and when we learn that even parallel lines of railway fail to secure competition and fair rates for carriage of goods, we must prepare to face the question whether all the railways of the county should not be owned and operated by the government in the interest of the people at large. In conclusion he trusted that, with the moral support and material help (in the shape of millions of bushels of wheat for shipment over the road) of our American friends in the valley south of the line we should see work begun on the road before spring is gone.

Rev. John Scott, the pioneer Presbyterian minister in this section of Manitoba, made a happy speech in seconding the resolution. He stated that he was present at the meeting in Emerson mentioned by Mr. Fairbanks, and he remembered how wild and chimerical the scheme was then looked upon by most people. Since then a wonderful change had come over the community. All classes were now drawn together and joining in the effort to bring about the opening up of this route. He made a happy allusion to the cosmopolitan character of the convention; said it was difficult to tell a Minnesotan or a Dakotan from a Manitoban, and no wonder, as we all sprang from a common ancestry. He saw nothing objectionable in asking the government to build the road for the benefit of the people. The government was of the people and by the people. In England the government had cheapened postage and telegraphy, greatly to the benefit of the masses of the people and greatly to the acceleration of trade and commerce. Why should not the Manitoba Government undertake an enterprise of such vital importance to the welfare of the province and which would benefit all classes? He thought that with a "long pull and a pull altogether" we ought to be able to accomplish the opening up of this route.

Mr. Adrian Nelson, of Selkirk, thought it was in the interest of all that we should find the cheapest way to ship our products, and the cheapest way would be the shortest outlet. He thought that the resolution should read: "From the foot of navigation on Lake Winnipeg" instead of from the northwest end.

The mover and seconder having stated that they would have no objection to the alteration being made, the resolution was so altered, when it was put to the meeting by President Nash and carried unanimously.

THE ROAD A COMMERCIAL ENTERPRISE.

Hon. Halvor Steenersen, of Crookston, a member of the Senate of Minnesota, having been introduced to the convention by the President, moved the following:

Resolved, that a railway extending from the north end of Lake Winnipeg to Churchill Harbor on Hudson's Bay would be a Commercial undertaking in the full acceptation of the word with an abundance of freight assured from the opening of the road.

Senator Steenerson said that should a railway be built to Hudson's Bay by the Government as proposed, the people of Manitoba who would have to pay for it, would want to know whether the road would pay when constructed, and naturally we would be interested in known what products are tributary to it. He could not say anything in regard to the feasibility of the route because he was not posted in the matter; one object in attending this convention had been to obtain information on that point. He felt confident, however, that if the Hudson's Bay Route was found practicable—and there seemed little reason to doubt but that it would be—that a railway from the north end of Lake Winnipeg to Hudson's Bay would pay well on the investment, as he thought he would be able to show by figures that he would submit later on. He said that under present circumstances there was little or no profit in raising grain in the Red River Valley, owing to the cost of carring grain to the seaboard, and that the people of Minnesota and Dakota would hail with great delight the opening up of this short outlet to the European markets. Referring to the matter of the Government building the railway, he said he was aware that it was a favorite theory with English writers on philosophy that the Government should interfere as little as possible with private enterprise. He had once himself thought it a beautiful theory, but was beginning to think the contrary now. To use a homely expression "the proof of the pudding is the eating thereof." Minnesota's experience with railways was that they took all that was possible out of the people. He thought it an excellent plan that an important outlet such as this proposed Hudson's Bay Railway would be should be built, operated and controlled by the Government who would always be amenable to the people for its proper conduct. If the Hudson's Bay Route is not opened up he was sorry to say that but little more grain than is now raised would be produced in Northern Minnesota. He then proceeded to give figures showing how much a very small portion of his senatorial district could contribute in the way of grain to the proposed railway should it be constructed. The County of Polk of which Crookston is the county seat, contains seventy-five townships, with an acreage of 1,728,000, of which 150,000 acres are at present under cultivation, which would give at an average yield of 18 bushels to the acre, 2,400,000. Granting that over three quarters of the land in this county is tillable and cultivated, it would produce 23,328,000 bushels, and Polk and Kittson counties combined would produce over 32,000,000 bushels of grain. There are three other equally as productive counties in the speaker's senatorial district, which is but one-half of the Minnesota part of the Red River Valley. If they should be charged one half what they pay now they would contribute a couple of millions of dollars to the road. He showed the [illegible] advantages that would accrue to the [illegible] of the Red River Valley by getting their wheat [illegible] and [illegible] resolution [illegible] Mr. Quincy of the Fargo [illegible] ber of Commerce, seconded the resolution in an eloquent speech. He prefaced his remarks by saying that he thanked God that he was permitted to once again put his foot on Canadian soil and once more address a Canadian audience. He had left his home at Belleville eleven years ago, and although he now claimed to be a good American, his heart still beat with patriotic emotion when he gazed on the grand old Union Jack and he felt as loyal to Her Gracious Majesty, Queen Victoria as ever. He then proceeded to discuss the H. B. Route from a commercial point of view. Competition, he said, is wanted and the proposed route was our only hope. He quoted from statistics showing that the Red River Valley is two hundred miles long south of the boundary and forty wide, which gives about eight thousand square miles. Deducting for this amount town sites, &c., we have nearly four million acres of exceedingly fertile land, giving an average of eighteen bushels to the acre. We can count upon a possible yield of seventy million bushels. Handling this quantity at fifteen cents gives us over ten million dollars; and it will require to move it one hundred and forty thousand cars, or three hundred and eighty cars per day for every day in the year. Some day these figures may be realized, but supposing you divide them by two we can assure ample business by the proposed route for its profitable working.

Mr. Douglas, M. P. P., said that before the resolution was voted upon, he would like to refer to a fact that the mover and seconder, if aware of, had overlooked. They had referred to the possible yield of grain in the future should this route be opened up. There was evidence that even now there is almost enough grain raised in this country to make the H. B. Railway a paying one. He had learned from an official source on a recent visit to Fargo that the St. Paul, Minneapolis and Manitoba Railway alone had transported from the Red River Valley during the past year, eleven millions bushels of grain.

Mr. Quincy—and there's one million bushels more in sight.

The resolution was then put and carried without dissent.

It being 5 o'clock, the convention adjourned till 7:30.

Evening Session First Day.

At the arrival of the hour for opening the evening session, the hall was packed, over 500 people being present. The gallery was filled with ladies. The Emerson Infantry Co. Brass Band, with their new and beautiful silver-plated instruments, were present, and discoursed sweet music previous to the opening.

President Nash called the meeting to order shortly after 7:30 and introduced Rev. John Semmens, pastor of the Methodist Church, Emerson, who spent six years on the shores of Hudson's Bay and in its vicinity, and who has made six or seven trips to the Bay, both in winter and summer, in canoe and on snowshoes and with dog sleigh.

Mr. Semmens, who has established a reputation as a ready and talented speaker, was greeted with loud applause. He moved the following:

Resolved, that we regard the practicability of the Hudson's Bay route as established beyond all question, and that although an examination of the various channels in Hudson's Straits should be proceeded with, that the construction of the railway northward should not be deferred pending such examination.

After a few humorous allusions which helped to put the speaker and his audience on good terms with each other, Rev. Mr. Semmens proceeded to say: The scheme which we have met to consider is a great one and is therefore destined to provoke objection and opposition. As a rule the greater the undertaking the more fierce the critics and the stronger the opposing forces. Its advocates will be accused of over enthusiasm, of imaginativeness, of selfishness. It was not long ago that we, then secure in our eastern heritage, laughed at the folly of western bounds emigrants and decried the object of their search. But we came, we saw, we stayed and our purpose is to remain and by working out our own destiny to contribute as largely as may be to the best interests of the fairest portion of her Majesty's domain. Corporations which have linked the eastern demand to the western supply cannot be expected to support what at first thought may have the appearance of an opposition route but the days are not distant when this project fully understood will be endorsed by both east and west as the best possible solution of the present distressing problem of hard times. Boston once mobbed Wendell Phillips because of his advocacy of the abolition of slavery, but now she places wreaths of laurel on his new made grave; and some of the foremost advocates of this route (among whom are some of Emerson's citizens) will yet be held in high honor by those who shall share in the benefits to be secured; by those even who at first declared that no such a channel of commerce could ever be utilized.

Difficulties are associated with this projected highway as with all undertakings worthy of being considered great. Years ago a bar in New York harbor made entrance thereto difficult; but pluck, capital and skill removed it and gave to navigation clear course. The St. Lawrence was at one time not considered valuable as an outlet of Canada's commerce but the difficulties have been overcome. The neck of land at Suez compelled ships not so long ago to go around the continent of Africa on their way to famous India. The Isthmus of Panama will in the near future present no obstruction to sea craft heading for the Pacific. The desert of Sahara may ere this generation passes become a sea. Gentlemen, we live in an age when difficulties do not deter us, with our steam drills and shovels, with explosive forces, with wisely expended capital, with the no surrender of human energy, and on every hand we behold the seemingly impossible yielding to nineteenth century accomplishment.

[illegible]

[illegible] the Saskatchewan and [illegible] the northern half of Lake Winnipeg [illegible] will be a barrier in the way of construction [illegible] encountered by those who prepare the way but this is not without its uses. It will supply prairie land with cheap fuel, fill the lumber yards of the west with supplies of building material, afford fuel to construction engines and constitute an effectual and an inexpensive snow brake in the months of winter. Bridges it is said will necessarily increase the cost of construction greatly. This is by no means likely, for the rivers to be crossed are not large and the banks are high and rocky affording good foundation and the valleys are prompt, making the length as a rule little more than the actual width of the river. The Cantilever bridge at Niagara and the Victoria at Montreal may give us the assurance that this difficulty will not be considered serious enough to check the onward march of our commerce. The rock cuttings along the upper portion of the road will be considerable yet nothing worse than has been overcome in connecting Port Arthur with Winnipeg. The Lake Superior section of the C. P. R., is by far rougher than anything that must be encountered on the way to Hudson's Bay. Surely when the Rocky Mountains can be scaled a half dozen times in the effort to secure the Pacific trade the little hills of the valley of the Nelson are not to frighten us. Thirty rivers in all pour their waters and will yet pour their wealth into the Hudson's Bay. The Moose, the Albany, the Hayes, the Nelson, the Churchill or English River are to be the feeders of the route which is at present under contemplation. Lignite, gypsum, petroleum bearing limestone, anthracite, iron pyrites, soapstone, copper, silver, gold are all included in the discoveries already reported to have been made mica and iron ore have been actually shipped to eastern markets. White red, pitch and jack pine can be found in large quantities at some distance from the coast on the rivers, which afford every facility for driving. Spruce from 40 to 70 feet high cover large areas. Tamarac, birch and cedar, fir, balsam and aspin are among the less valuable trees of the land. The waters of the Bay abound in fish and little or no effort has been made to obtain them. Large schools of caplin argue the existence of the cod. Salmon abound and can be made a profitable article of commerce, white porpoises, whales and seals are also there awaiting the coming of their captors. Indeed, our American brethren have found out the whales while we have slept and have helped themselves to millions of dollars worth of oil and whalebone which they sell back to us at prices which must pay them for freighting it half way around the continent.

NAVIGATION OF HUDSON'S BAY—ITS HARBORS.

York Factory at the mouth of the Hayes River is at present the port of entry for the Hudson's Bay Company's trade and it is strongly argued that Nelson River should be the future seaport of the west. The strong tidal waves which roll in twice a day, the ice gorges carried southward by these waves, the bar at present existing, the low land along the shore seem to some to be very strong arguments against this as the future outlet. Churchill harbor to such persons appears to possess many advantages over its rival. It is an excellent harbor, sheltered from tidal waves and ice gorges by a comparatively narrow entrance. It has deep water, is accessible to ships drawing 30 feet of water even at low tide. The channel leading to it is half a mile wide and twelve fathoms deep. It has good holding ground. Ships can approach quite close to shore. The entrance is somewhat narrow, but Admiral La Perouse entered it with a 74 gun ship in 1876 when he went to destroy Fort Prince of Wales, without ever having seen it before and cleared again without damage, and surely what has been done under such circumstances safely, can be done with all modern advantages under command.

Chabot entered this bay in 1498, Hudson in 1610, Button in 1612, Gibbons in 1613, Fox in 1631, and the Hudson's Bay Company in 1875. Since that time the last named corporation has made 730 voyages. The American whalers have made more than 200 voyages into this bay in the last 50 years. It is a singular fact that in all these voyages there have been but few losses. America lost four vessels in the north part of the bay. England lost two ships and all hands perished. The Hudson's Bay Company lost two vessels on a calm night at ten o'clock after some social and festive gatherings in the cabins of friendly whalers. This, so far as we know, completes the list of the lost. If these men could successfully navigate the bay with old-fashioned ships with never a buoy, a beacon or a lighthouse, and with no correct chart to protect the mariner from danger, what is not possible to modern steamships with all the existing accessories to successful navigation. As to the length of time during which it is possible for ships to move in the waters of the Hudson's Bay: The traders usually enter in June or July and clear again about the first of October or late in September. Capt. Gillan entered Rupert River in 1868 on December 9th and left it on the 8th of April of the following year. He repeated his trip in 1870, entering Nov. the 8th and departing on April the 29th. The York boats sailing along the coast usually leave York Factory in the month of May, showing navigation to be open at that time even for small boats propelled by oars. Available records show that the Hayes River is open for six months in the year and that the Nelson is open for fully seven months. We can hardly be in error by saying that for sailing vessels we have at present four months of navigation and who can deny the right of steamers to ply to and fro for fully five, perhaps six.

The advantage of this route as to the saving of distance has been so often referred to that few words are now necessary. Churchill is 64 miles nearer to Liverpool than Montreal and 114 nearer than New York. Churchill is nearer to Winnipeg than Montreal by 734 miles at least, and the saving of freight over this distance would be nearly $200 a car. This at 30 cars a day for ten years would throw a good deal of money into the pockets of the grain producers of their country, and it is [illegible] developments have convinced us that grain raised in the west cannot be sent to Europe via Montreal and give profit to both farmer and dealer. Let us, if possible, said the speaker, have this road. He much mistook the temper and pluck of the west if people do not with eagerness embrace this opportunity of revolutionizing their condition and prospects. And it seemed to him that our rulers at Ottawa, finding that we are in earnest and united, will gracefully yield to popular demand and give us extension of boundaries or whatever else will be most likely to help us in our straitened circumstances.

The above is but a brief synopsis of the Rev. gentleman's remarks. He spoke at considerable length, interspersing his remarks with an occasional humorous bit and finally closed by reciting some lines of poetry applicable to the situation and took his seat amid tremendous applause.

VALUABLE TESTIMONY.

Mr. Adrian Nelson, C. E., of Selkirk, seconded the resolution. Mr. Nelson made a preliminary survey for the Winnipeg & Hudson's Bay Railway Co. of their proposed line between Winnipeg and Port Nelson, and spent a summer and winter on the shores of the Bay. He said he could not altogether agree with what the previous speaker had said of Port Nelson. He had visited both the harbors of Nelson and Churchill, and he believed that Nelson Harbor would ultimately prove to be the most advantageous one. Fort Churchill, he admitted, has a most magnificent harbor, but it is about one hundred miles farther away, and would thus entail a much greater outlay for a railway. One advantage, however, possessed by this harbor is that it would require but a trifling outlay for wharves as the water is deep close up to the shore. This advantage is not possessed by the harbor at Port Nelson. Here a considerable expenditure of money would be required to make a good harbor. He drew an outline in chalk on a blackboard which had been provided for the purpose of the Bay, harbors and river emptying into them. He said that the only way to get a good harbor at Nelson would be to utilize an island in the river, a distance from the bay of 23 miles. At this point a reef extends diagonally across the river and by utilizing this as a foundation a breakwater could be built from the left bank to the island, behind which ships could find good shelter. It would be difficult to get good wharfage, however, as the banks of the river are very precipitous and 280 feet high. A small stream comes in at this point from the northeast which could be utilized by dredging it. A short distance from its confluence with the Nelson it was bordered on both sides by low land and here dockage could be obtained. It had been estimated that it would take $3000,000 to make a good harbor here. The Nelson is always open to a point 15 miles from the bay, owing to its current and the tide. The tide rises about four feet in the river and comes rushing in with a "rear," and at a rate that would outstrip a man running. The Nelson is a large stream, receiving the waters of a vast arey of country and having a volume of water greater than the St. Lawrence. For this reason it is open much earlier than at Churchill and closes later, and therefore would be of more value to commerce ultimately than Churchill harbor. It has a channel with thirty-six feet of water at low tide, and a steamer of the Allan line could steam up the distance of 83 miles. The information he was giving had been obtained by himself, by actual surveys and soundings. The country between Nelson and Churchill was comparatively level and would offer no great obstruction to railway construction. The speaker then took up the question of the navigation of the Hudson's straits, and showed by reports of ship captains and other navigators and explorers that they have been successfully navigated for years, and that for at least four months of the year are almost entirely clear from ice. According to the testimony of whalers who have wintered in the Bay, ice does not generally form on the Bay a distance of more than four or five miles from shore, except where the water is shallow. Whalers generally winter in the northwest part of the Bay, about 100 miles north of Port Churchill, where they allow their vessels to freeze in ice and remain until about April when they saw them out and pursue their calling. He considered it an absurdity that this province should be asked to wait for the report of the expedition to be sent out by the Dominion Government, as everything which they could discover had already been discovered, and it was a very trifling indeed, as to whether the route was open for four months or four months and a half, and that was about all the Dominion expedition would definitely settle. The straits were but twice as large as Lake Winnipeg and no larger than Lake Superior. There were plenty of half-breeds in this country who would not hesitate to sail around them in a canoe. It was his opinion that the straits never freeze over, owing to the strong tide which rises to the height of 30 or 40 feet. It would be folly to spend $150,000 and three years to explore them. No doubt there would be plenty of work for a steamer to do there in locating headlands, &c., but it was absurd to ask us to delay building the road until the Straits had been thoroughly explored. He thought by utilizing the inland waterways of the Northwest and constructing a railway from the foot of navigation on Lake Winnipeg to Port Churchill the route if work was commenced soon, could be opened up in two years. He estimated that it would cost from five to six millions of dollars to build a road from Lake Winnipeg to Churchill, and not to exceed an average of $20,000 a mile. A portion of the route would be no more difficult than prairie construction. He referred to the navigation of Red River and Lake Winnipeg, and said that he had paddled in a canoe from Fargo to the northern end of Lake Winnipeg. With comparatively small expense the Red River could be improved so that a steamer could take a tow of barges loaded with wheat at Fargo and tow them without transfer to a point on Nelson River within 257 miles of ocean navigation. A good deal was said about the danger of storms on Lake Winnipeg, and that steamers navigating Red River could not venture through the Lake. But with the improvement of one or two rapids on Red River steamers could be made stronger and of deeper draft. There was also any number of good harbors on the west shore of Lake Winnipeg to a point 65 miles down stream. There is only one obstruction that makes the navigation of this stretch in the least difficult, and that is a rock standing above water and which could be removed at a cost of $4,0. Nelson River is navigable from Hudson's Bay a distance of 83 miles. He knew this to be a fact from actual soundings. The river at its mouth is 23 miles wide. At the head of steamship navigation, 83 miles up from its mouth, it is one and three fourths of a mile wide. Owing to a long stretch of rapids it would be impossible—as a commercial undertaking—to make a continuous water route by constructing canals, but to connect the head of ocean steamship navigation with inland water navigation at the point down the Nelson River he had mentioned, would require only 257 miles—actual measurement—of railway. In his opinion, should a road be built to Port Churchill it would have to run on on the east side of the Nelson River and cross above its mouth, as after three year's survey they had been unable, owing to an exceedingly rocky section of country found on the west side, to find a practicable route on the west side. By running it on the east side, however, and crossing the Nelson at a point 83 miles from its mouth, a comparatively easy route could be obtained. Mr. Nelson closed by reiterating his confidence in the practicability of the route, and expressed a belief that it would not be many years, if the people went about the matter right, before they would be shipping their cereals to European markets by this channel.

The resolution was then put and carried unanimously and amidst applause.

Col. Plummer, editor of the Fargo Republican, was next called upon, and made one of the most eloquent speeches ever delivered in Manitoba. He spoke at considerable length, but held his audience delighted and spellbound by his eloquence—in fact, to use a vulgarism, he fairly "paralyzed" them. We are only able to give a very brief synopsis of his remarks. He made a glowing reference to the identity of interest between the people of Manitoba and Minnesota and Dakota. Instead of being cousins we are brothers divided only by an imaginary political line. We had a common ancestry; were decendants of a common parentage, and "had sucked the love of liberty from the same mother's breast." He said that the farmers of the Red River Valley were suffering more from high rates of freight than any others in the world. He had an idea that as civilization advanced the nations of the world become closer united, and as we of the United States and of Canada are the descendants of a common parentage, and had identical interests, more particularly here in the Northwest, we should stand man to man in endeavoring to have the most advantageous outlet for our agricultural products. He then touched upon the late Fenian sensation, and said that he knew them of old, and instead of coming with flags flying and bands playing, and with arms to carry death and devastation to the helpless inhabitants, they would come in with pick and shovel to work on the railroad to the Hudson Bay. Referring to the country which will feed the proposed road, the speaker said that it was capable of producing an almost incalculable amount of grain, and that on behalf of the States of Minnesota and Dakota, he would hold out the hand of fellowship and brotherhood to the citizens of Manitoba. He then moved the following resolution:

Resolved, that it is a matter of vital importance to the farmers and to the inhabitants of the towns and cities in the Red River Valley that cheaper transportation to the seaboard for their surplus products should be secured as soon as possible.

Mr Megguire, of Pembina, in rising to second the resolution, said that he considered the interests of this country to be thoroughly identical with those of the neighboring States, and felt that the enterprise under consideration at the present moment called for the aid and influence of the bordering states. He had no doubt but that the route to Hudson's Bay would shortly be an established fact, and felt confident that when such was the case, the farmers would receive from ten to fifteen cents more per bushel than they do at present. He thought that the Canadian people were giving the subject too serious a consideration. The question, he said, should not be "can the road be built?" as that, he contended, had been proved beyond a doubt. The only question to be considered now is the ways and means. As he was not acquainted with the resources of the country, nor the feeling of the people and the government on the subject, he could not speak with any certanty, but in his estimation it is a very small undertaking for so great a people.

The resolution was carried unanimously.

Mr. A. H. Vaughn, of Selkirk, moved the following:

Resolved, that the natural highway for the exports and imports of the Red River Valey is by way of Hudson's Bay.

Mr. Vaughn referred to a feeling of sadness he used to entertain when a young man and a resident of Ontario because thousands of Canadians who were emigrating to the States, particularly to the Western States, where there was a large field for their enterprise, had no great West of their own to go to. Since then the Canadian Northwest had been opened up and it had afforded full scope for Canadian enterprise. It had opened a great field for railway enterprise, and we had shown that we were not one whit behind our enterprising neighbors to the south in rapid railway construction. But notwithstanding that the construction of railways had been rapidly proceeded with, we found that the shortest lines to the east still required too much toll from us, and that in order to make the great industry of this country pay we

'ROUND HOME.

Judge F. Ives was in from St. Hilaire this week.

The Breyer Comedy Co. departed for Warren on Tuesday.

John Hunter is is the city at work in the County Treasurer's office.

Lawyer Havreveld was in the city on Tuesday enroute for Devils Lake City.

Don't fail to secure your seats for "Led Astray," the finest drama of the season.

The masquerade on Friday evening last was said to be one of the most brillent affairs of the season.

P. H. Stromme, Esq., will deliver a lecture to-morrow evening at Wilson & Thompson's Hall. Subject: The doctrine of Predestination.

The Farmers' Tribune is the cheapest and best paper published. Send for sample, and if you like it subscribe for it. Tribune Company, Minneapolis.

The French Cornet Band furnished some excellent music and paraded the streets on Monday evening for the Breyer Comedy Company. They are a No. 1 Band.

Young people's meeting held in the Baptist Chappet every Sunday evening from quarter after six to quarter after seven. Meeting dismissed in time to get to other church services. All the young people cordially invited.

Uncle Daniel Cameron was in the city, from his saw mill at Woodside, on Saturday last, and reports having had a good business all winter. He says that he is selling good lumber for $16 per M. and intends to be able to supply all demands. He will continue to supply the demand as long as it exists.

Subscribe for the Minneapolis Farmers' Tribune and you will get, not only the best news and agricultural paper published in the interest of the Northwestern Farmer, but a package of choice flower and garden seeds worth at any store $1. Send to Tribune Company, Minneapolis, for sample copy.

Mr. F. T. Haseltine says it is singular what a difference a cypher or two makes in an item. Last week he informed us that he had contracted to furnish Mr. E. S. Gerser 45,000 forest trees and by the omission of nothing the item was made to read 4,500. We now proceed to correct the item by adding nothing to it and making it read 45,000 trees as it should be.

Messrs. Stewart & Lawrence have purchased the Carman lumber yard and will unload at that point a portion of the 1,000,000 feet of lumber that A. M. bought while at Duluth recently. A. M. says he had a fine visit at Duluth, says that work is being pushed on the new elevators that when completed will add 5,100,000 to the storage capacity for wheat. Messrs. S. & L. will soon begin to receive their lumber and be ready for the spring opening.

The Imperial Tree Bean is attracting very much attention among agriculturists. It is a remarkable producer, and in quality excels the far-famed white navy. The Minneapolis Farmer's Tribune, among the many other excellent things it is doing to promote good husbandry in the Northwest, is giving away to its readers packages of the seed of the Tree Bean. Our readers will be interested in seeing the Tribune's liberal offer. Send for sample copy.

The Minneapolis Farmers' Tribune gives one dollar's worth of choice garden seeds—among which is a package of the Imperial Prolific Tree Bean—to every one who sends the name of a new subscriber (it may be his own name) with the yearly subscription price of the paper, $1.15. The seeds are of the purest quality, specially selected, and are what would be paid a full dollar for at any seed store in the country. Sample copies of the paper are sent free.

The many friends of Mr. Carl Kretzschmar, in this city, were pained last week to learn of the death of Mrs. Kretzschmar, which occurred on Thursday evening at her residence in Red Lake Falls. Mr. and Mrs. Kretzschmar were among the first who cast their lot in with our citizens, commencing business in a small way in 1878, in a small building on Robert Street, afterward building, what was in those days considered, a large store on Second Street where they accumulated a fine property. In the spring of 1883, they removed to Red Lake Falls where they built a handsome residence and were prepared to enjoy the prosperity they had worked so hard to win, but [illegible]

The County Commissioners are to meet on Tuesday, March 18th and 10 a. m.

Tuesday night's train was delayed by the storm until Wednesday at 1 o'clock p. m.

Doctor Barnes won the poems as the best speller at the Congregational spell last week.

Tickets for "Led Astray" are now on sale at Morris Bros. Jewelry store, on Second Street. Dont fail to secure your seats early.

The Sheriff's sale of stock which was to have taken place at Schrader's barn on Saturday last was adjourned till next Saturday at 10 a. m.

The Lake View Hotel has been re-opened to the public by S. P. Norton, who is now prepared to entertain the traveling public in first-class style. Headquarters for passengers for Red Lake Falls.

Theo. Holton, of Larimore, paid us a visit on Tuesday. Although a temporary resident of Dakota, Theo cannot forget his first love, and we would not be surprised to see him return to Minnesota to live not long hence.

Dr. Thomas is another happy man. He says the boy weighs 8½ and he was so happy about it that he forgot to give us our cigar in time for publication last week. The lad will celebrate his birthday on every Sunday that comes along on the 2d day of March hereafterly.

It has been suggested that it is about time for the agricultural society to call a meeting to elect officers for the ensuing year. There is now plenty of time to make arrangments for the June meetings, and, as there is a fine track and everything else in readiness there is no reason why the society should not reap a harvest. We would suggest that those having the matter in charge attend to it at once.

Again we are called upon to refer to the printer's rule regarding anonymous communications. We would also gently hint to "Taxpayer" that his article comes under the ban relating to personalities, his communication seeming to bear down rather heavily upon one of our prominent citizens although evidently intended as a burlesque upon said prominent citizen.

The W. V. Breyer Comedy Company appeared at Ericsson's Hall, on Saturday evening in "The Child Stealer" and gave universal satisfaction as they always do. On Monday evening the play, "Still waters run deep" was rendered in a very pleasing manner, giving if anything better satisfaction than the other piece. For some reason the attendance was very light both evenings and we are sorry to have to say that they played here at a loss. We are sorry this is so because if it is any object for a city to patronize and encourage outside dramatic companies, all first-class companies should have the preference. Mr. and Mrs. Breyer are both accomplished and experienced in their chosen calling, thoroughly understanding it and they employ the very best talent for their support that the country through which they travel will warrant, and if any company ever deserve a liberal patronage certainly it is the Breyer Comedy Company. We have seen catch-penny, "two-for-a-nickel" shows draw a crowded house while this company, which has an established reputation did not pay its expenses here. We are aware of the fact that times are not overly flush at present and to this fact must we attribute this failure for we know that this company has many warm personal friends in this city and has always played to a full house heretofore. Should they ever return we trust they will meet with a far different reception.

Farmers Alliance.

A meeting of the farmers Alliance is hereby called to convene at the city hall in Crookston on Saturday, March 15th at 2 o'clock p. m. for the purpose of electing delegates to represent the Polk County Farmers Alliance in the convention at St. Paul on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday next. A full attendance is requested.

M. R. Brown President.
H. E. Cooke Secretary.

Oyster Supper.

An Oyster supper will be given at Land Office Hall to-morrow evening by the ladies of the Congregational society. A good supper may be had from 6 to 10. All are cordially invited.

Teachers Examinations.

Spring examinations for teachers of Polk County will be held as follows:

Crookston at the Court House, March 27th and 28th.

East Grand Forks, at School House April 1st and 2d.

Red Lake Falls, at School House, April 4th and 5th.

V. D. Carbeth,
County Supt. of Schools.

To Rent.

For three years, a fine farm with plenty of wood and water, handy good house and stables. No money required as rent, can be paid in improvements on the farm. A rare opportunity for some industrious individual. Address Journal office.

Led Astray.

It is with pleasure we are able to announce to our readers the fact that the Crookston Dramatic Club is now prepared, and will on Wednesday and Thursday evenings, March 19th and 20th, produce the great emotional drama in five acts entitled "Led Astray." This is the strongest and most able work of the renowned author Dion Boucicault and wherever it has been produced in the leading and most popular theaters throughout the United States, has been hailed with eagerness and its presentation attended with wild applause. The club has been hard at work upon this difficult undertaking for the past five or six weeks, and neither expense or labor have been spared to render this their most successful efforts. Below we give the cast of characters and bespeak for them the liberal patronage their earnest efforts deserve:

Rudolph Chandoce	Will C. Kops.
Hector Placide	Frank McLean.
Mount Gosline	I. G. Hughes.
George De Lesparre	I. M. DeCamp.

The sale of reserved seats begins next Monday morning at 9 o'clock at Morris Bro.'s jewelry store. No seats will be sold before this time, first come will be first served.

Mentor, Polk County, Minn.,
February 25, 1884.

Editor Journal: Here goes for a few locals from Mentor:

Church sociables are all the go now; the last, given by the ladies of the Episcopal society, was held at the residence of H. S. Atlix, and all had a good time. Seventy-five people were present. Rev. Mr. Currie, of Crookston, was present, and remarked that the Crookstonites might come out and learn how to entertain people at sociables, which was a nice compliment to us. He had held service at the church the night before and promised to come again soon, which is the wish of all the people who have met him.

The bond question was settled in the negative with us on the ground of no security for the fulfillment of promises made by the proposed railroad company. The road is needed badly enough, but the people would not agree to back a draft of $200,000 without some assurance that the obligation was sure to be fulfilled, and until we get the railroad we have to wait and hope, and in order to assure success we must go into mixed farming, get more stock and less machinery, pay for what we get and in this way we will buy what we get on the merits of the article, not, as now, on time at double its worth and interest added. The Iowa farmers claim that they were in the same situation when they all depended on wheat, as we are here to-day, namely on the verge of bankruptcy. How did they surmount it? Why, they went into mixed farming, erected creameries which called for less help, less machinery, and they made money, paid cash for their groceries, as they did not have to live on the from "spring to fall system" as we are obliged to do when raising wheat. There is a good profit in sheep on the farm, as they are not expensive and their wool clip comes off when the farmer as a rule is short of ready money. Raise your own pork if you have to fatten them on your wheat crop, which will pay better than the present market price for wheat. And another thing, unless you put back some of the nutriment of the ground, $1 per bushel won't pay for raising wheat in this country, for we will soon impoverish our land and it will not be worth while to take up the mortgages with which they are encumbered. This can also be remedied with stock. Seed down some of the land you have open, grow less wheat, raise more stock and let it be of the best breeds we can find. To do this it would be well to form a farmers club and buy male stock of all classes of the best breeds, and own them in each settlement, charging those who do not own an interest a fair price for their use, thus enabling all who desire to soon be on the road to fair success and prosperity. Some farmers recommend building a farmers' mill, get all their wheat ground up and put it on the market in the form of flour, as well as having the bran and shorts to feed the stock, which would be a great help, for they would need some extra feed aside from hay to make them pay through the winter. By bringing about these results we would open the way to crush the wheat monopoly, for crushed it must or we are crushed.

Dr. Cable has been out attending in his professional capacity Miss Burris, who has been very sick but is now recovering. The doctor informs us that he intends moving back soon. We will all be glad to see him with us again.

Mr. Jacob Harpster is back again on his farm, this time to stay. His daughters came with him. They came from Ohio recently. The young ladies will be more than welcomed as they are a scarcity in this section.

Harry says you put it pretty strong on his statement. The stock he spoke of was prospective, and when you state he has herds and is loping it out here you are off your base and poking fun at him; never mind, it will come out all O. K. in the wash. Send one or two of those Holsteins that we may breed up a little.

Uncle Daniel Cameron is doing a fine business, sawing, this winter.

Enough.

HOW EDNA DECIDED.

A splendid June day, bright and breezy. Opposite the great square in its carpet of green, stands a large brown painted house with bow-windows and spacious piazzas, half shrouded in blossoming wisteria.

On one side is a croquet ground, and on the other a glimpse of a lovely old fashioned garden, green, cool, and shadowy, the mere sight of which is refreshing.

It is Sunday, and the people on their way to church. Most of those who pass this way are evidently of the elite, for the street is the fashionable one of the town.

As they pass the brown house, each looks up at the bow-windows, as if expecting to see there a face that they know.

But none is visible, though perhaps those whom they look for are nearer than they imagine; for at one end of the upper piazza, screened by the matted wisteria, are two young girls, dressed in thin slippers and white cool muslin seaques.

One of the girls is tall, fair, stately, and a trifle inclined to embonpoint. One can predict that at 40 she will make a very handsome and imposing woman.

The other is nearly as tall, but lithe and sylph-like, with a clear olive complexion, dark roguish eyes, and a face pretty and piquant.

"How pleasant this is!" she says. "I would not exchange with those people going to church."

"Nor I," says the other quietly. "I seldom go to church in summer."

"And Aunt Mary and Bernard—do they go regular?"

"As for Bernard, he seldom goes at any time—spends the day lying on the library sofa, reading. Mamma is generally an inveterate church-goer; but just now she is on bad terms with the new minister, and vows that if he don't resign she will join the other church. It is one of her whimsies."

"How odd!" says Edna, laughing.

"Oh, you don't know her! I forgot that you have not been here since you were a little thing of six years old. What a pity uncle should have his family so far away. We have been so cut off from each other."

"He had to do it, you knon, when he failed."

"Yes, dear, I know, and I have always felt very sorry for you. We, ourselves, live up to our income, and papa declares he will have nothing to leave Bernard and myself; but still we live in good style, and anything, in my opinion, is preferable to being a governess. How you must hate it!"

"Yes, indeed!" with a sigh, "and I dread the thought of going back to it. I have no aptitude for teaching. I like dress and gayety, and should like of all things, to be rich, and the mistress of just such a house as those two handsome ones opposite. Whose are they?"

"One—that handsomest of the two, with the greenhouse and fountain—is for sale. The other belongs to Mr. Derwent, one of our first lawyers. And by-the-bye, Edna, here is a chance for the realization of your wishes for Mr. Derwent is a rich widower, and, it is reported, on the lookout for a young wife. So don't fail to set your cap at him!" she added, in a tone half laughing and half earnest.

"Any children?" asked Edna, idly.

"One—soon to be married and go away. He must, of course, have a mistress for his establishment, for he is fond of entertaining and living in style, and——There!" she added suddenly, as the door of the opposite house opened, and a gentleman descended the steps, "that is Mr. Derwent! How do you like his looks?"

Edna bent a little forward for a sight of the rich lawyer.

He was about forty, and very good-looking, but stiff and precise.

Edna shrugged her graceful shoulders.

"I could never like a man who walks in that excrutiatingly-dignified manner," she said.

"Then I may congratulate myself in having never been remarkable for dignity of mien?" said a voice in the doorway behind them.

There stood a handsome young man, tall, dark, with a silky moustache, and steel-colored eyes under his dark eyebrows.

He sauntered up leisurely, and stood leaning against the balustrade, with folded arms, looking down upon the wo girls. Edna blushed slightly as she et his gaze.

"Have you been eavesdropping?" she nquired saucily.

"No indeed! I came upon you quite nawares, heard a chirping and chatterg as of many magpies, and thought—"

"Don't be impertinent, Bernard," says is sister serenely.

"I? Certainly not! And if my cous- Edna entertains the least idea of hat you hint at, I am ready to go down pon my knees and ask pardon."

"Not here," said Edna, "on the piaz- floor. I heard Aunt Mary complaining that it had not been swept for a ntury; and your immaculate white t would suffer."

"Thank you for your solicitude on account, but I have a soul above h low interests. Dress is nothing in eyes."

"It is a good deal in mine. I love s, and devote much of my time and ights to it. There, now I have told truth," she added, laughing, "and leave you to meditate upon the folly romankind while I go and write a r home."

d she airily tripped away while his followed her to the door.

"Then I'll get papa to do it," said ra, rising and serenely walking off.

o Mr. Derwent came to dinner, and talked very sensibly and cleverly, and d formal and polite attentions to Miss Laura Warden and her cousin. [illegible] after dinner, the party ad[illegible] to the drawing room, and Mr. [illegible] opposite and of the [illegible] occupied by Edna. Bernard takes up a book and studies the effect of the letters in an inverted position, refusing utterly to glance in their direction.

Edna, on the contrary, finds it difficult to not watch Bernard. She tries in vain to confine her attention to what Mr. Derwent is saying, and more than once answers absently, and hopes that Bernard will pity her and come to the rescue. And she finds it a great relief when at last the guest takes his departure.

"Well," says Laura as her father escorts the visitor to the front door, "how do you like him?"

"He's very nice," Edna answers with a sharp glance across the room; "and," pointedly "very agreable!"

Bernard shrugs his shoulders and forces a smile of compassion.

"I should think, Bernard," his sister remarks, "that you might have paid more attention to Mr. Derwent, considering he was our guest."

Bernard flushes at this.

"What could I do with an old Methuselah like that?" he demanded indignantly.

"Old? He's only about 40," avers Laura.

"And so fine looking!" says Edna.

Whereupon Bernard throws down his book, taking his hat, thinks he will step over to the Ogilvies and ask Miss Bella to go to church in the evening.

And Edna declares that she has a headache, and retires to her room for a nap, and lies awake for a full hour, thinking.

She likes Bernard—likes him more and more every day; but Mr. Derwent is rich, and she knows by this time that she can, if she will, be mistress of that elegant establishment opposite. Oh, if I had never seen Bernard, how much easier for me it would be!

In the two weeks following, Edna sees a great deal of Mr. Derwent. The town in summer is gay with strangers, for whom parties and picnics, and entertainments of all sorts are got up; and at these Mr. Derwent and "that charming little brunette, Miss Edna Porter," are about the most conspicuous.

"Edna," says Bernard, stepping through the French window on the piazza; and taking a seat on the front steps beside his cousin, "have you promised to go to the party with the patriarch?"

The term he now generally applies to Mr. Derwent, who in the cool of the evening has stopped for a few moments to exchange some pleasant remarks with the young ladies, and has just left them.

Now Edna has been all day expecting Bernard to offer his escort to this party, and she feels vexed that he has not done so.

"If I have," she says sharply, "I don't see why you should want to know about it."

"It is none of my business now, certainly. I can only leave you to your chosen escort, and hope that you may have a nice time, and be benefited by his society and conversation."

"I don't see why I should not have a nice time in Mr. Derwent's society," says Edna still more sharply.

"Certainly, if it were a scientific lecture, for instance, or a funeral, or a murder trial; but for a pleasure party and dancing, don't you think a little—eh—incongruous?"

Edna gives him a severe look, and maintains a dignified silence. Laura comes hastily to the rescue.

"What will you wear?" she enquires.

"Blue, I hope," says Bernard quickly, and with an earnest glance at his cousin who looks up.

"Why," she asks softly. "Is it your favorite color? or do I look better in blue?"

"Oh, neither exactly; only"—he appears the least bit embarrassed—"only the idea occurred to me that I prefer to see ladies dressed in blue."

"Don't tell stories, Bernard," says his sister reprovingly. "You know perfectly well that you want Edna to wear blue because Mr. Derwent remarked just now that he admired white. Youv'e been evesdropping at the window."

Bernard scrowls at his irrepressible sister, and Edna colors.

"Of course, dear, you will wear white?" Laura continues coaxingly. "Mr. Derwent will expect it, you know."

"Indeed, I don't see what right he has to expect it," Edna answers with sudden asperity.

And Bernard's contracted brow clears again. He looks gratefully and almost tenderly down at the still blushing face beside him. But the girl plays with her fan, and will not look up.

On the evening of the party, in her own room, Edna spreads out two dresses side by side, and surveys them long and meditatively.

She twice takes up the white robe, but hesitates; and then she glances at Bernard's portrait which hangs beside Laura's over the little writing-desk in a corner.

From this she turns to the window and looks across at the handsome house opposite.

Oh, if only that house were Bernard's instead of Mr. Derwent's. But had not Laura told her that her father had declared he would have nothing to leave herself and Bernard?

Down stairs in the parlor, the gentlemen are waiting.

A light step is heard on the stair, and both the gentlemen turn.

A graceful, sylph-like figure stands in the doorway, her eyes rather downcast as she pretends to arrange a refractory bracelet. There are crimson roses in her dark hair, and her dress is white.

Mr. Derwent advances, looking pleased, and Bernard takes his hat and goes off alone to the party.

When Edna arrives she sees him in a bay-window, talking gravely with Miss Ogilvie—a handsome, intelligent-looking girl, and Laura's special friend.

"I had hoped," Laura had said to her cousin, "that Bernard would marry Bell Ogilvie. I know she likes him, and just before you came I thought he was just beginning to pay her some attention; but one never knows how to take Bernard."

After this affair of the white and blue dresses, Bernard is for some days rather cool and distant to his cousin.

Edna does not like it—her conscience perhaps reproaches her—and one day, standing in the low window, she places her hand lightly on his coat-sleeve, and says coaxingly,

"What is the matter, Bernard? have I offended you?"

He turns his dark eyes upon her without a word.

"I am sure I never intended it," says Edna.

He takes the little hand lying on his coat sleeve [illegible]

"If you never intended [illegible]

"Forgive what? [illegible] innocent surprise. [illegible]

But her color betrays her, and Bernard smiles as he says still holding her hand:

"You are no actress, little cousin. You know to what I allude."

"But, Bernard, that blue dress was—well, was really shabby, and you would not at all have liked to see me in it! And besides you know—Mr. Derwent had offered to escort me to the party."

"He's decidedly officious and frisky for his age," says Bernard disapprovingly.

"Frisky! Oh, Bernard!" says Edna, laughing.

"Has he asked you to go to the picnic?" enquired her cousin suspiciously.

"Not exactly. He—merely alluded to—"

"Merely took it for granted that you were bound to go with him, and so he needn't be in a hurry to ask you!" says Bernard wrathfully.

"Then he will find himself mistaken," Edna says with emphasis.

"Are you sure of that?"

"Sure? Of course! And to prove it, I'll go with you, Bernard," this very sweetly, "if you will let me, and aren't engaged to Miss Ogilvie."

"Miss Ogilvie is nothing to me. She's a nice sensible girl, but I'm not in love with her, as Laura, and mother, and all of them seem to think."

"They say you liked her once," says Edna, glancing up askance, and half-shading her face with her fan.

"I like her well enough, and, perhaps, might have liked her better in time. But since you came, Edna——"

At that critical moment, Laura innocently entered the room.

It was a charming picnic, as everybody said. Laura had plenty of partners, but as for Edna, the beaux generally, though reluctantly, seemed inclined to respect the pretentions of Mr. Derwent.

Bernard, from remote corners, watched that gentleman's attentions to his cousin, and pulled his moustache with inward wrath and resentment.

He began, too, to look with doubt upon Edna; for had she not that evening encouraged him in the sweetest manner, and was she not now, to all appearances, equally encouraging his rival?

A sudden thought sent the blood to his brow. Could it be that this charming cousin of his was a coquette, and was making a fool of him?

At this moment the couples began to take their places for a quadrille, and Bernard sees Mr. Derwent, in his usual stately and deliberate manner, making his way to Edna across the crowded floor.

Slipping past the row of wall flowers, he reached his cousin's side in advance of his rival.

"Are you engaged for this set?" he whispered!

"Yes, to—to Mr. Derwent," glancing at her card.

He takes the card from her hastily, and thrust it into his pocket, just as a tall head and shoulders loom up near them.

"Dance this set with me, Edna: I ask it as a favor—as something more than a favor!" he said earnestly.

She knows what he means. He is pressing her hand. This is the decisive turning-point, which she feels that she cannot evade.

"Our dance, I believe, Miss Edna," says Mr. Derwent, offering his arm.

Edna hesitates, and casts a glance at Bernard, wistful and appealing.

He speaks instantly, and there is a subdued triumph in his look and manner:

"Beg pardon, Mr. Derwent, but I think you are mistaken. This is my dance?"

Edna slightly turns to Mr. Derwent. Her breath comes quickly, and her fingers tremble a little as she endeavors to fasten that troublesome bracelet.

"Let Miss Edna decide which of us is right," says Mr. Derwent with dignified politeness.

He is a little flushed.

Bernard, on the contrary, is slightly pale, and his eyes are intently fixed upon his cousin.

She avoids his glance, and turning, takes Mr. Derwent's arm, murmuring something about having lost her card.

Mr. Derwent walks off with her upon his arm, with a little pleased smile of triumph lurking about the corners of his mouth, and Edna sees no more of Bernard that evening.

Next morning the girls come down to an 11 o'clock breakfast, and Aunt Mary, as she poured out their coffee, scolded them for staying so late on the moonlight porch after their return from the picnic.

Laura only smiled placidly, and Edna toyed with her apron and blushed.

"I—I have something to tell you, Aunt Mary."

Aunt Mary, glancing at her, nearly sprang from her chair.

"Bless my soul, child! you don't mean that Mr. Derwent proposed to you last night?"

Edna smiled as she nodded assent, and Aunt Mary at once turned up the girl's face and kissed her.

"I'm perfectly delighted. Why, it's the very best match in town, and almost in the whole country. Your father and mother will be so pleased."

"I knew he would propose last night Edna," Laura says quietly; "and I'm so glad dear!"

And then, after some moment's excited talk on Aunt Mary's part, the latter says suddenly:

"And I have a piece of news, also, though not so important as yours, Edna. Bernard——"

"Where is Bernard?" said Laura, "and why did he leave the picnic so suddenly. And the news—what do you think of his having purchased that Morford House opposite—the one next to Mr. Derwent's?" said Aunt Mary nodding to Edna.

"Why, mother?" said Laura in surprise. "He heard—let me see, it was the day before yesterday—that Judge Taylor wanted the house, and he just rushed up to the agents office and secured it on the spot," said Aunt Mary triumphantly.

"But," said Edna vaguely, "I did not know—I mean, how could he afford it?"

"Afford it? Why, child, he's rich enough?"

"Rich?" questioned Edna, wonderingly.

"You don't mean to say, Edna, that you didn't know that Bernard's grandfather died years ago and left him the whole of his handsome fortune? Why, I should think of course, Bernard would have told you. [illegible]

[illegible] perfectly delightful to think of Mr. Derwent and Edna owning one of those beautiful houses just opposite us, and Bernard and Bella the other. For, of course—But what's the matter, Edna, child? Ah, these picnics, and late hours, and courting are too much for you—Go upstairs, dear, and lie down."

She obeys white and trembling; and no one guesses the wild regret, the bitter pain and remorse, and the vain longing that lie deep down in her heart as she murmurs—

"Had I known it yesterday."

Low-necked Dresses.

Washington Letter.

A great fuss is being kicked up because some of the ladies at the White House reception wore extremely low-necked dresses. That they do appear in costume very much abbreviated from the neck down, there is no sort of dispute. That the wearers of these low-necked costumes are well-favored and pleasing to look upon, I have heard no one—at least no gentleman—complain. It is my belief that the uproar has been created by some of the lean and hungry ladies who could not safely presume to appear in similar rig, and that they have communicated their opposition to decollete costumes to sympathizing lady correspondents. That would be enough. It ought to be said that the wearers of the lowest dresses and the possessors of the busts that are really worth exposing to a curious public, are the ladies of the foreign legations. It is sometimes embarrassing to be obliged to stand by one of these charming creatures, as she sits on one of the sofas in the corridor, with a superb costume that is nothing but a pair of straps from the arm pits up—but then one is obliged to accustom himself to many strange things in this cosmopolitan city.

"Beware of the Vidders."

Mr. Dud. Mobley of Coffee county, Ga., wishes he had heeded the elder Weller's advice to "beware of the vidders." Mrs. Judy McCook, a sprightly widow, cast a web of fascination over Mr. Dud and made him believe that she loved him and would marry him. Ditto Mr. Bird Mobley. Arrangements for an early wedding were made by both parties, and Mr. Bird Mobley, to keep things quiet, asked his betrothed to meet him at a certain point on the Ocmulgee River and they would get married. Meantime the other suitor had his suspicions aroused, and at once went to the house where the lady resided and besought her to come out and wed him. The lady shut herself up and refused the invitation. The disappointed wooer sat by the door, waiting for day and his doom, but, to his sorrow, when day came the house was searched, Mrs. McCook was wanting, and later information leaked out that she had escaped through a window, went to the river, and married Bird Mobley according to promise.

Industrial Training.

The Massachusetts Institute of Technology has now 443 students in the school of Industrial science, and 114 in the school of mechanical arts and the Lowell school of practical design. Of the value of the Institute's training, President Walker says: "Here is a case in point: The President of one of the great lines of transportation in this country—a man with a genius for organization and execution—said to me, but a short time ago, that he could take a young man of good sense, good judgment, and good habits, a graduate from our course in civil or mechanical engineering, and, by passing him through the successive grades of responsibility in railroad management, could in five years' time make him a better general superintendent than could be made of a man lacking the preparation in twenty years. The day of half-trained men is past in this country in all occupations—or is rapidly going past."

Precedence at Washington.

Concerning the much discussed question of precedence among ladies in Washington official society, Miss Frelinghuysen is reported to have written as follows in a private note, setting at rest the story of ill-feeling between her mother, Mrs. McElroy, and Mrs. Carlisle: "It seems too bad that what the president intended as a compliment to a new speaker's wife, should be construed as rudeness to my mother, to whom he is studiously polite and most generously considerate. Mrs. Carlisle and we are excellent friends. The receptions of the president my mother has attended, and will always attend; but Mrs. McElroy's Saturday afternoons she has begged to be excused, as she is so weary of standing. The story is foundationless, but has wonderful life and lasts long, because people love to think there is not peace in President Arthur's household."

The Real Ruler of Canada.

The central figure in the Canadian parliament is also the greatest figure in Canada. He is Sir John A. Macdonald, the real ruler of Canada, with but a short interruption, for twenty-five years, and the greatest man British North America has produced. Other politicians are there, a dozen of them, who have been knighted by the queen, but while he is like them, Knight Commander of the Provincial Order of St. Michael and St. George, he is more than that. He is Knight Commander of the Bath, and, more than that, he is a member of the Imperial Privy Council, which is a distinction enjoyed by no other man in Canada. The others are honorable; he alone is right honorable, like William E. Gladstone. Sir John is 70 years old, and has been a legislator for forty years.

Sham "Duties to Society."

It is a wise and suggestive saying that the Wilkie Collins puts in the mouth of one of his characters, that one may live comfortably on a certain income named, "provided that she does not owe duties to society." How many a piece of extravagance is excused and glossed over with the plea that really one is obliged to do this or that—that it wouldn't look well not to, [illegible]

Farmers Who Are Always On The Move.

The farmer himself is the most fascinating adjunct of a Kansas farm. It is here that the contented steadfastness of the population of the far Eastern States has met half way the disorder and turbulence of the far West, and the meeting has resulted in a type of character which I believe has not its counterpart elsewhere in the world. His history has usually been somewhat as follows:

He was born and "raised" in Ohio. When he reached man's estate—the estate, by the way, being lacking—he "struck out" for the West and settled perhaps in Indiana. Thence when "things got too thick" he migrated to Illinois, and after a sojourn of a few years in that State he was swept by the tide of emigration into Missouri, where, as he will tell you, "the rebels were too rank," and he soon hitched up the family schooner, embarked the family gods, and crossed into Kansas.

On his travels he has somewhere picked up a companion to whom a certificate, carefully preserved in a frame shows that he has been married by a justice of the peace, and of whom he invariably speaks as "his woman." He and "his woman" have managed to accumulate a family more or less numerous and hungry in the superlative degree. The spirit of unrest that has controlled him heretofore has yielded to the desire of middle life for quiet, and he feels as though he was now settled, and looks forward vaguely to a claim in Colorado or a farm in Iowa when the tendencies of his early days have again gathered force to stimulate him to push on. There is no such thing, however, as contentment among a certain class of young men; they intend to pre-empt "that claim in Colorado before the land is all taken up."

While waiting at a little way station on the Kansas Southern Railroad recently I noticed on the platform a young farmer, I took him to be, who with "his woman" and family of three children seemed to be also waiting for the train:

"Well," I said to him, "are you off for Colorado?"

"No,' said he "Ioway."

"Going to settle there?" I inquired.

"Yes," he replied; "I was up there in September, and I seed a nice little farm that I took a notion to, and so I thought that if I could sell out here for anything like that would cost me I would go and buy. Wall, a fellow came along and offered me $10 an acre for my eighty, and that eighty up thar in Iowav wasn't but $12 an acre, and so I invested."

"Well," said I, "is the Iowa farm a better farm?"

"I dunno as it is any better," he answered "Maybe the buildin's ain't quite so good, but then me and my woman was sorter tired of Kansas, and then she had the shakes, she did, and so we thought we'd move."

"How long have you been in Kansas!"

"Five years going on next April."

"Where did you come from before that?"

"Nebraska."

"Where were you raised?"

"Illinois."

"Well, my friend," said I, "dont you know that you are moving out of the part of Kansas of which Mr. Greeley said that if the Garden of Eden was anything like it Adam and Eve were great fools for ever leaving? According to your own showing you won't better your self any by going; your wife will be as likely to get the chills in Iowa as in Kansas; you are runnning in debt on your farm; you have all the trouble and expense of moving, and the probability is that it will be years before you are as well off again as you are now."

"Wall," said this specimen of go-ahead-activeness, "my folksdo tell me that a rolling stone don't gather no moss; but I tell them that a settin' hen don't git fat." I had no answer to this, for I had never reflected on the drawbacks which the setting hen may have to encounter.

This restlessness is the most characteristic feature of the Western native farmer of the middle and poorer classes. He is always uneasy, never long satisfied anywhere. He is always going to settle somewhere but can't find the place where he is willing to admit that he means to live and die. He helps to develop an immense amount of country, but can't bring himself to stay long enough to reap the reward of his labor. I was riding along a Kansas country road recently in company with a gentleman who was well acquainted with the community. Of twelve houses which we passed nine, I was told, had been built less than five years; and of these nine, seven were owned by other than the original builders. Four had changed owners twice.

Of course what has been said above does not apply to a very large number of farmers, who are either of foreign birth or have brought with them from homes in the far Eastern States traditions of perseverance and contented industry. The Germans are proverbial everywhere for taking the most unpromising upland claims and sticking to them till they blossom, if not with the rose, certainly with yearly crops of Indian corn, which are the admiration and the envy of the possessors of the most fertile farms on the bottoms and along the creeks.—Burlington (Kan.) Letter.

Burning Church Bonds.

New York World.

A meeting of the congregation of the First Presbyterian Church of Yonkers was held Thursday evening, at which William Allen Butler presided. Mr. Walter L. Law was present and offered to pay off the bonded indebtedness of the church parsonage, amounting to $10,000 on condition that the present pastor's salary be increased $600, making it $4,100, together with the use of the parsonage. Resolutions were adopted accepting the generous offer and complying with the conditions. John Olmsted, President of the Board of Trustees, handed a certified check for $10,000 from Mr. Law to William Allen Butler, jr., agent of the bondholders. The latter then turned over ten bonds of $1,000 each to Mr. Law, who took them into the study, and in the presence of the Trustees and pastor, the Rev. John Reid, threw them into the fire. A committee was appointed to communicate to Mr. Law the thanks of the church and congregation.

[illegible] Abroad.

Electric lighting in Europe is advancing more rapidly than the American public seem to realize. Gas is usually [illegible] poorer in quality than here, and modern improvements in the making of it are slowly adopted. The Bon Marche, at Paris, where 1,500 clerks are employed, tried 400 electric lamps, and has now increased the order to 2,000. The St. Lazare Railway station tried a few lamps in the vestibule, and will now extend the system to the whole vast establishment covering some twelve to fifteen acres. The Grand Opera House, at Paris, with its 1,100 permanent employes, has a gas bill of $60,000 a year, and it has been experimenting for the past two years with almost every known system of electric lighting, American or otherwise. In Milan the Manzoni Theater is lighted by electricity, and the vast Theater La Scala now has a complete equipment of engines, boilers, and dynamo machines from New York, adequate to 10,000 lamps, in position under the shadow of the great Cathedral, without so much as a wire or a puff of steam in sight from the Cathedral itself.—Electrical Review.

Need of Economy.

One of the hardest lessons in life for young people to learn is to practice economy. It is a harder duty for a young man to accumulate and save his first $1,000 than his next $10,000. A man can be economical without being mean, and it is one of his most solemn duties to lay up sufficient in his days of strength and prosperity to provide for himself and those who are or may be dependent upon him in days of sickness or misfortune. Extravagance is one of the greatest evils of the present age. It is undermining and overturning the loftiest and best principles that should be retained and held sacred in society. It is annually sending thousands of young men and young women to ruin and misfortune.

Cultivate then, sober and industrious habits; acquire the art of putting a little aside every day and for your future necessities: avoid all foolish and unnecessary expenditures. Spend your time only in such a manner as shall bring profit and enjoyment, and your money for such things as you actually need for your comfort and happiness, and you will prosper in your lives, your business, and will win and retain the respect and honor of all worthy and substantial people.

Orientals at Their Meals.

A lady writing from Jerusalem to the Lewiston (Me.) Journal says: Meats generally are boiled and pulled apart with the fingers. Knives and forks are quite unknown. The Arabs are astonished at the skill with which foreigners handle knives and forks. The oriental seizes a piece of meat from the dish with his fingers, tears off the morsel of his choice and puts the rest back into the dish. Or if he has an honored guest, he fingers out a nice piece of meat and insists on inserting it in his guest's mouth. One can easily see how necessary it is to wash one's hands after eating soup with one's fingers! Well, here comes a servant in petticoats, a sort of hungry-looking Esau in a red skull cap and barefooted. He fetches a pitcher and a basin and pours water over our fingers, the water dripping into the basin. So did Elisha, the son of Shaphel, who poured water on the hands of Elijah. Jesus, you remember, after the memorable supper of this sort, girded himself with a napkin and did even more menial service—washing not only the guests' hands, but their f et. There could be no higher proof of humility to an oriental mind!

The Explosion of George Francis.

Venal scoundrels! There's blood on the face of the moon! Lizard's leg and gall of goat! Have at it, ye curs! Out damned spot! Whang! Bang! Wh-o-o-p! Miscreants all of ye!—More ink!—Spartan dogs, I hate ye! Roast ye in deep-down gulf of fire! Turn the rascals out! Come on, feeble carrions, all of ye! Carrions, all of ye! Carcasses fit for hounds! Goose-fleshed, fevered lepers and paralyzed imbeciles, I hate ye!—More ink!—Emaciated, horned idiots, pack terriers and gliding ghosts, avaunt! Cap and knee slaves, vapors, minute jacks, naked gulls and disheloth harbingers of pestilential visits have at it!—More ink!—Green sickness carrion and tallow faced baggage, away! Away! Norwayean banners flout the sky! Carbuncled-backed toads, dove-feathered hogs and canvas-backed hellions pale before me! Turn the rascals out!

Heirs to $20,000,000.

Chicago Tribune.

The Hamburg relatives of an adventurous German emigrant are reported to have fallen heir to a fortune of great magnitude. The story is going the rounds of the German press. Seventy years ago a dissolute young poacher left his native village of Kirchsteinbeck, where he was in bad odor and had frequent difficulties with the police and game-keepers, and embarked for Cape Colony, where he became, in course of time, a prosperous planter and stock-raiser, and the owner of one of the most valuable estates in the settlement. Late in life he sold this property for a large sum, and took up his residence in London. Fortunate speculations there increased his wealth still more, and when he died intestate, some years ago, his property was worth over $20,000,000. Efforts to discover his heirs proved unavailing until recently, and the estate has ever since been waiting for them in Chancery. The people who now inherit this wealth supposed their adventurous relative dead long ago.

A Far-West Restaurant.

"You infernal idiot! Can't you understand plain English? I want a glass of water—water to drink! and I want it quick" said a guest in a Bismark (D. T.) hotel, according to the Tribune of that town. In desperation the waiter hunted up the proprietor and told him the story. The landlord looked puzzled and himself entered the dining room and approached the stranger and said: "Excuse me, sir, but my waiter is a little hard of hearing. I will take your order." "I ordered a glass of water—nothing but straight water." "I'm sorry," replied the landlord, "but I can't accommodate you. There is so little call for those foreign drinks that it doesn't pay to keep em. We've got some prime Kentucky whisky, if you can get along with that." The stranger finished his meal in silence.

The Shame of England.

London Letter.—It does seem a shame that a few people should own all the land in this great country, and that while millions can, with the greatest difficulty, eke out scarcely enough to keep them from starving, a privileged number, who never earned a penny in their lives, and many of whose ancestors never did, should be rolling in affluence! No wonder the working classes are beginning to feel dissatisfied. The more the facts are scrutinized the greater will the injustice appear. Twenty-eight dukes in the United Kingdom possess one hundred and fifty-eight separate estates, comprising nearly four million acres. The other members of the peerage, four hundred and ninety-seven in number, hold one thousand four hundred and thirty-five separate estates, embracing about ten million acres. Of thirty-three million acres in England and Wales, more than seventeen million acres are owned by a body of men which probably does not exceed four thousand five hundred. According to Hon. George Brodrick, Warden of Morton College, Oxford, nearly half the inclosed land of England and Wales is owned by about two hundred and fifty persons. The largest landed proprietor amongst the peers is the duke of Sutherland, who owns more than a million acres. His rent roll, however, is not as large as that of some peers with much less property; his income from land amounting to only $656,875, while that of the Marquis of Bute, who owns only one hundred and sixteen thousand acres, is considerably over a million dollars. The Duke of Buccleuch comes second to the Duke of Sutherland in number of acres and second to the Marquis of Bute in size of income. His land comprises four hundred and fifty-nine thousand five hundred and fifty acres, and his rent roll is about $1,100,000. The Duke of North-cumberland's rent roll ranks next, being $880,000 and next to him comes the Duke of Devonshire, with about $25,000 less. The Earl of Derby and Earl Fitzwilliam receive rents amounting annually to about $700,000. Altogether there are ten peers who each receive over $500,000 a year from land.

The Human Face.

Nothing is more wonderful than the human face. At first merely negative, innocent and pretty, as seen in the infant, it responds in the young person to every emotion and passion as quickly and as truly as do the musical chords to the touch; and when, later in life, personal character has become matured and fixed, the face tells to every discriminating observer what that character is.

Some faces are naturally beautiful, yet actually repulsive; others naturally homely, yet actually attractive. We may veil the true face by training it to some artificial expression; but the dominant trait will at times flash into the features, like lightning from a cloud, and betray the secret.

If we would look pure, just, kind, generous, wise and manly, we must virtually be all this in the debts of our being. If we are lustful, grasping, selfish, proud, deceitful, cunning, we cannot permanently keep the face from hanging out the expression that is the horrid sign of these base qualities.

But there are faults of the face which we cannot easily correct, if we take hold of them in time, though even these connect with inner tendencies. We can throw off at will a gloomy look,—where there is no real grief behind it,—and in doing so we shall find the heart itself will be cheered by the effort.

If we are conscious of a look of contempt for our fellows graving its lines about our lips, we can bethink ourselves of its self-conceit and wrongs and check it at its fountain-head.

If we find wrinkles of anxiety forming on our forehead, we can smooth them out by a more child-like trust in the Great Father. If our children are beginning to miss the sunny smile,—and they will be sure to miss it if it is wanting, and will show it, too,—we must unbend oftener from our graver duties, and put ourselves back into loving sympathy with their little world.

As we pass into age, the muscles shrink and harden, and less fat is deposited beneath the skin. Hence the face looses its well-rounded curves of beauty. There then begins—in connexion with a graver habit of thought—a tendency to press the lower jaw strongly against the upper. The bony framework of the jaws contract with age, and the lower part of the face therefore often becomes much distorted, the chin and the nose being brought into unseemly proximity. This tendency to press the lower jaw upward should be resisted.—Youth's Companion.

A Texan Episode.

Recently a Georgian, who had gone to Texas, built a cabin in the woods, and opened a clearing, was charged by a band of strangers with being a murderer. Being innocent, he refused to confess and was dragged some distance into the woods and was tied to a stake. Several shots were fired at him and the shot struck close to him. This failing to frighten a confession from him, he was tortured with knives and finally singed with firebrands. Daylight coming on, his tormentors hurried away, leaving him tied to the stake with a promise that he would be left there until he starved to death. Four days and nights he remained in this situation, without food or drink. He was fast becoming mad, when one night a solitary man, disguised beyond recognition, visited him and gave him water and food. On the seventh night he was as mysteriously set free. On regaining his home to make preparations for flight he learned that the real murderer had been caught and lynched.

No "Abbot Kiss" After All.

From the Kansas City Times.

A few years ago there was much talk about the "Abbott kiss." Now, there is no such thing as the "Abbott kiss;" there never was an "Abbott kiss." The form of osculation was so named by a class of emotional or empiric paupers, who either were constitutionally incapable of comprehending the nature of a true kiss, or whose experience had been so limited that they had not discovered it for themselves. Consequently, when these people beheld the practical illustration of such a kiss on the stage they were forthwith moved among themselves and they exclaimed one to another: "Behold, this is something new and soulful in the way of a kiss. It is altogether different from the conventional lip contacts, the touch-and-go pecks, the resounding 'busses' which we have known among ourselves. Verily, this deserves to be apart from other kisses; let us designate it as the 'Abbott kiss.'"

HOW EDNA DECIDED.

A splendid June day, bright and breezy. Opposite the great square in its carpet of green, stands a large brown painted house with bow-windows and spacious piazzas, half shrouded in blossoming wisteria.

On one side is a croquet ground, and on the other a glimpse of a lovely old fashioned garden, green, cool, and shadowy, the mere sight of which is refreshing.

It is Sunday, and the people on their way to church. Most of those who pass this way are evidently of the elite, for the street is the fashionable one of the town.

As they pass the brown house, each looks up at the bow-windows, as if expecting to see there a face that they know.

But none is visible, though perhaps those whom they look for are nearer than they imagine; for at one end of the upper piazza, screened by the matted wisteria, are two young girls, dressed in thin slippers and white cool muslin seaques.

One of the girls is tall, fair, stately, and a trifle inclined to embonpoint. One can predict that at 40 she will make a very handsome and imposing woman.

The other is nearly as tall, but lithe and sylph-like, with a clear olive complexion, dark roguish eyes, and a face pretty and piquant.

"How pleasant this is!" she says. "I would not exchange with those people going to church."

"Nor I," says the other quietly. "I seldom go to church in summer."

"And Aunt Mary and Bernard—do they go regular?"

"As for Bernard, he seldom goes at any time—spends the day lying on the library sofa, reading. Mamma is generally an inveterate church-goer; but just now she is on bad terms with the new minister, and vows that if he don't resign she will join the other church. It is one of her whimsies."

"How odd!" says Edna, laughing.

"Oh, you don't know her! I forgot that you have not been here since you were a little thing of six years old. What a pity uncle should have his family so far away. We have been so cut off from each other."

"He had to do it, you knon, when he failed."

"Yes, dear, I know, and I have always felt very sorry for you. We, ourselves, live up to our income, and papa declares he will have nothing to leave Bernard and myself; but still we live in good style, and anything, in my opinion, is preferable to being a governess. How you must hate it!"

"Yes, indeed!" with a sigh. "and I dread the thought of going back to it. I have no aptitude for teaching. I like dress and gayety, and should like of all things, to be rich, and the mistress of just such a house as those two handsome ones opposite. Whose are they?"

"One—that handsomest of the two, with the greenhouse and fountain—is for sale. The other belongs to Mr. Derwent, one of our first lawyers. And by-the-bye, Edna, here is a chance for the realization of your wishes for Mr. Derwent is a rich widower, and, it is reported, on the lookout for a young wife. So don't fail to set your cap at him!" she added, in a tone half laughing and half earnest.

"Any children?" asked Edna, idly.

"One—soon to be married and go away. He must, of course, have a mistress for his establishment, for he is fond of entertaining and living in style, and——There!" she added suddenly, as the door of the opposite house opened, and a gentleman descended the steps, "that is Mr. Derwent! How do you like his looks?"

Edna bent a little forward for a sight of the rich lawyer.

He was about forty, and very good-looking, but stiff and precise.

Edna shrugged her graceful shoulders.

"I could never like a man who walks in that excrutiatingly-dignified manner," she said.

"Then I may congratulate myself in having never been remarkable for dignity of mien?" said a voice in the doorway behind them.

There stood a handsome young man, tall, dark, with a silky moustache, and steel-colored eyes under his dark eyebrows.

He sauntered up leisurely, and stood leaning against the balustrade, with folded arms, looking down upon the wo girls. Edna blushed slightly as she net his gaze.

"Have you been eavesdropping?" she nquired saucily.

"No indeed! I came upon you quite nawares, heard a chirping and chattering as of many magpies, and thought—"

"Don't be impertinent, Bernard," says is sister serenely.

"I? Certainly not! And if my cous- Edna entertains the least idea of hat you hint at, I am ready to go down pon my knees and ask pardon."

"Not here," said Edna, "on the piaz- floor. I heard Aunt Mary complaing that it had not been swept for a ntury; and your immaculate white t would suffer."

"Thank you for your solicitude on account, but I have a soul above h low interests. Dress is nothing in eyes."

"It is a good deal in mine. I love ss, and devote much of my time and ghts to it. There, now I have told truth," she added, laughing, "and leave you to meditate upon the folly romankind. while I go and write a r home."

d she airily tripped away while his followed her to the door.

ernard," said Laura, "I want you ylay Mr. Derwent and invite him nner."

ery well. Why?"

ecause I've a plan concerning Edna. him on Friday evening at the congazing very admiringly at her, and hought——" onsense! If that's all I won't invite ."

Then I'll get papa to do it," said ra, rising and serenely walking off.

o Mr. Derwent came to dinner, and talked very sensibly and cleverly, and d formal and polite attentions to h Miss Laura Warden and her cousin. And when, after dinner, the party adrned to the drawing room, and Mr. went, after a brief chat with Mrs. rden, leaves the lady's side, and seats self on the opposite end of the sofa occupied by Edna. Barnard takes up a book and studies the effect of the letters in an inverted position, refusing utterly to glance in their direction.

Edna, on the contrary, finds it difficult to not watch Bernard. She tries in vain to confine her attention to what Mr. Derwent is saying, and more than once answers absently, and hopes that Bernard will pity her and come to the rescue. And she finds it a great relief when at last the guest takes his departure.

"Well," says Laura as her father escorts the visitor to the front door, "how do you like him?"

"He's very nice," Edna answers with a sharp glance across the room, "and," pointedly "very agreable!"

Bernard shrugs his shoulders and forces a smile of compassion.

"I should think, Bernard," his sister remarks, "that you might have paid more attention to Mr. Derwent, considering he was our guest."

Bernard flushes at this.

"What could I do with an old Methuselah like that?" he demanded indignantly.

"Old? He's only about 40," avers Laura.

"And so fine looking!" says Edna.

Whereupon Bernard throws down his book, taking his hat, thinks he will step over to the Ogilvies and ask Miss Bella to go to church in the evening.

And Edna declares that she has a headache, and retires to her room for a nap, and lies awake for a full hour, thinking.

She likes Bernard—likes him more and more every day; but Mr. Derwent is rich, and she knows by this time that she can, if she will, be mistress of that elegant establishment opposite. Oh, if I had never seen Bernard, how much easier for me it would be!

In the two weeks following, Edna sees a great deal of Mr. Derwent. The town in summer is gay with strangers, for whom parties and picnics, and entertainments of all sorts are got up; and at these Mr. Derwent and "that charming little brunette, Miss Edna Porter," are about the most conspicuous.

"Edna," says Bernard, stepping through the French window on the piazza; and taking a seat on the front steps beside his cousin, "have you promised to go to the party with the patriarch?"

The term he now generally applies to Mr. Derwent, who in the cool of the evening has stopped for a few monents to exchange some pleasant remarks with the young ladies, and has just left them.

Now Edna has been all day expecting Bernard to offer his escort to this party, and she feels vexed that he has not done so.

"If I have," she says sharply, "I don't see why you should want to know about it."

"It is none of my business now, certainly. I can only leave you to your chosen escort, and hope that you may have a nice time, and be benefited by his society and conversation."

"I don't see why I should not have a nice time in Mr. Derwent's society," says Edna still more sharply.

"Certainly, if it were a scientific lecture, for instance, or a funeral, or a murder trial; but for a pleasure party and dancing, don't you think a little—eh—incongruous?"

Edna gives him a severe look, and maintains a dignified silence. Laura comes hastily to the rescue.

"What will you wear?" she enquires.

"Blue, I hope," says Bernard quickly, and with an earnest glance at his cousin who looks up.

"Why," she asks softly. "Is it your favorite color? or do I look better in blue?"

"Oh, neither exactly; only"—he appears the least bit embarrassed—"only the idea occurred to me that I prefer to see ladies dressed in blue."

"Don't tell stories, Bernard," says his sister reprovingly. "You know perfectly well that you want Edna to wear blue because Mr. Derwent remarked just now that he admired white. Youv'e been evesdropping at the window."

Bernard scrowls at his irrepressible sister, and Edna colors.

"Of course, dear, you will wear white?" Laura continues coaxingly. "Mr. Derwent will expect it, you know."

"Indeed, I don't see what right he has to expect it," Edna answers with sudden asperity.

And Bernard's contracted brow clears again. He looks gratefully and almost tenderly down at the still blushing face beside him. But the girl plays with her fan, and will not look up.

On the evening of the party, in her own room, Edna spreads out two dresses side by side, and surveys them long and meditatively.

She twice takes up the white robe, but hesitates; and then she glances at Bernard's portrait which hangs beside Laura's over the little writing-desk in a corner.

From this she turns to the window and looks across at the handsome house opposite.

Oh, if only that house were Bernard's instead of Mr. Derwent's But had not Laura told her that her father had declared he would have nothing to leave herself and Bernard?

Down stairs in the parlor, the gentlemen are waiting.

A light step is heard on the stair, and both the gentlemen turn.

A graceful, sylph-like figure stands in the doorway, her eyes rather downcast as she pretends to arrange a refractory bracelet. There are crimson roses in her dark hair, and her dress is white.

"Mr. Derwent advances, looking pleased, and Bernard takes his hat and goes off alone to the party.

When Edna arrives she sees him in a bay-window, talking gravely with Miss Ogilvie—a handsome, intelligent-looking girl, and Laura's special friend.

"I had hoped," Laura had said to her cousin, "that Bernard would marry Bell Ogilvie. I know she likes him, and just before you came I thought he was just beginning to pay her some attention; but one never knows how to take Bernard."

After this affair of the white and blue dresses, Bernard is for some days rather cool and distant to his cousin.

Edna does not like it—her conscience perhaps reproaches her—and one day, standing in the low window, she places her hand lightly on his coat-sleeve, and says coaxingly:

"What is the matter, Bernard? have I offended you?"

He turns his dark eyes upon her without a word.

"I am sure I never intended it," says Edna.

He takes the little hand lying on his coat-sleeve.

"If you never intended it, Edna I'll forgive it."

"Forgive what?" in innocent surprise.

But her color betrays her, and Bernard smiles as he says still holding her hand:

"You are no actress, little cousin, You know to what I allude."

"But, Bernard, that blue dress was—well, was really shabby, and you would not at all have liked to see me in it. And besides you know—Mr. Derwent had offered to escort me to the party."

"He's decidedly officious and frisky for his age," says Bernard dissapprovingly.

"Frisky! Oh, Bernard!" says Edna, laughing.

"Has he asked you to go to the picnic?" enquired her cousin suspicionaly.

"Not exactly. He—merely alluded to—"

"Merely took it for granted that you were bound to go with him, and so he needn't be in a hurry to ask you!" says Bernard wrathfully.

"Then he will find himself mistaken," Edna says with emphasis.

"Are you sure of that?"

"Sure? Of course! And to prove it, I'll go with you, Bernard," this very sweetly, "if you will let me, and aren't engaged to Miss Ogilvie.

"Miss Ogilvie is nothing to me. She's a nice sensible girl, but I'm not in love with her, as Laura, and mother, and all of them seem to think."

"They say you liked her once," says Edna, glancing up askance, and half-shading her face with her fan.

"I like her well enough, and, perhaps, might have liked her better in time. But since you came, Edna——"

At that critical moment, Laura innocently entered the room.

It was a charming picnic, as everybody said. Laura had plenty of partners, but as for Edna, the beaux generally, though reluctantly, seemed inclined to respect the pretentions of Mr. Derwent.

Bernard, from remote corners, watched that gentleman's attentions to his cousin, and pulled his moustache with inward wrath and resentment.

He began, too, to look with doubt upon Edna; for had she not that evening encouraged him in the sweetest manner, and was she not now, to all appearances, equally encouraging his rival?

A sudden thought sent the blood to his brow. Could it be that this charming cousin of his was a coquette, and was making a fool of him?

At this moment the couples began to take their places for a quadrille, and Berpard sees Mr. Derwent, in his usual stately and deliberate manner, making his way to Edna across the crowded floor.

Slipping past the row of wall flowers, he reached his cousin's side in advance of his rival.

"Are you engaged for this set?" he whispered!

"Yes, to—to Mr. Derwent," glancing at her card.

He takes the card from her hastily, and thrust it into his pocket, just as a tall head and shoulders loom up near them.

"Dance this set with me, Edna: I ask it as a favor—as something more than a favor!" he said earnestly.

She knows what he means. He is pressing her hand. This is the decisive turning-point, which she feels that she cannot evade.

"Our dance, I believe, Miss Edna," says Mr, Derwent, offering his arm.

Edna hesitates, and casts a glance at Bernard, wistful and appealing.

He speaks instantly, and there is a subdued triumph in his look and manner:

"Beg pardon, Mr. Derwent, but I think you are mistaken. This is my dance?"

Edna slightly turns to Mr. Derwent. Her breath comes quickly, and her fingers tremble a little as she endeavors to fasten that troublesome bracelet.

"Let Miss Edna decide which of us is right," says Mr. Derwent with dignified politeness.

He is a little flushed.

Bernard, on the contrary, is slightly pale, and his eyes are intently fixed upon his cousin.

She avoids his glance, and turning, takes Mr. Derwent's arm, murmuring something about having lost her card.

Mr. Derwent walks off with her upon his arm, with a little pleased smile of triumph lurking about the corners of his mouth, and Edna sees no more of Bernard that evening.

Next morning the girls come down to an 11 o'clock breakfast, and Aunt Mary, as she poured out their coffee, scolded them for staying so late on the moonlight porch after their return from the picnic.

Laura only smiled placidly, and Edna toyed with her apron and blushed.

"I—I have something to tell you, Aunt Mary."

Aunt Mary, glancing at her, nearly sprang from her chair.

"Bless my soul, child! you don't mean that Mr. Derwent proposed to you last night?"

Edna smiled as she nodded assent, and Aunt Mary at once turned up the girl's face and kissed her.

"I'm perfectly delighted. Why, it's the very best match in town, and almost in the whole country. Your father and mother will be so pleased."

"I knew he would propose last night Edna," Laura says quietly; "and I'm so glad dear!"

And then, after some moment's excited talk on Aunt Mary's part, the latter says suddenly:

"And I have a piece of news, also, though not so important as yours, Edna. Bernard——"

"Where is Bernard?" said Laura, "and why did he leave the picnic so suddenly. And the news—what do you think of his having purchased that Morford House opposite—the one next to Mr. Derwent's?" said Aunt Mary nodding to Edna.

"Why, mother?" said Laura in surprise. "He heard—let me see, it was the day before yesterday—that Judge Taylor wanted the house, and he just rushed up to the agents office and secured it on the spot," said Aunt Mary triumphantly.

"But," said Edna vaguely, "I did not know—I mean, how could he afford it?"

"Afford it? Why, child, he's rich enough?."

"Rich?" questioned Edna wonderingly.

"You don't mean to say, Edna, that you didn't know that Bernard's grandfather died years ago and left him the whole of his handsome fortune? Why, I should think, of course, Laura would have told you."

"I thought she knew," said Laura. "How strange that we never spoke of it in her presence: But mother doesn't this look as though Bernard were thinking of getting married?"

"Indeed it does. Why, I declare it's perfectly delightful to think of Mr. Derwent and Edna owning one of those beautiful houses just opposite us, and Bernard and Bella the other. For of course—But what's the matter, Edna, child? Ah, these picnics, and late hours, and courting are too much for you. Go upstairs, dear, and lie down."

She obeys white and trembling; and no one guesses the wild regret, the bitter pain and remorse, and the vain longing that lie deep down in her heart as she murmurs:

"Had I known it yesterday."

Low-necked Dresses.

Washington Letter.

A great fuss is being kicked up because some of the ladies at the White House reception wore extremely low-necked dresses. That they do appear in costume very much abbreviated from the neck down, there is no sort of dispute. That the wearers of these low-necked costumes are well-favored and pleasing to look upon, I have heard no one—at least no gentleman—complain. It is my belief that the uproar has been created by some of the lean and hungry ladies who could not safely presume to appear in similar rig, and that they have communicated their opposition to decollete costumes to sympathizing lady correspondents. That would be enough. It ought to be said that the wearers of the lowest dresses and the possessors of the busts that are really worth exposing to a curious public, are the ladies of the foreign legations. It is sometimes embarrassing to be obliged to stand by one of these charming creatures, as she sits on one of the sofas in the corridor, with a superb costume that is nothing but a pair of straps from the arm pits up—but then one is obliged to accustom himself to many strange things in this cosmopolitan city.

"Beware of the Vidders."

Mr. Dud. Mobley of Coffee county, Ga., wishes he had heeded the elder Weller's advice to "beware of the vidders." Mrs. Judy McCook, a sprightly widow, cast a web of fascination over Mr. Dud and made him believe that she loved him and would marry him. Ditto Mr. Bird Mobley. Arrangements for an early wedding were made by both parties, and Mr. Bird Mobley, to keep things quiet, asked his betrothed to meet him at a certain point on the Ocmulgee River and they would get married. Meantime the other suitor had his suspicions aroused, and at once went to the house where the lady resided and besought her to come out and wed him. The lady shut herself up and refused the invitation. The disappointed wooer sat by the door, waiting for day and his doom, but, to his sorrow, when day came the house was searched, Mrs. McCook was wanting, and later information leaked out that she had escaped through a window, went to the river, and married Bird Mobley according to promise.

Industrial Training.

The Massachusetts Institute of Technology has now 443 students in the school of Industrial science, and 114 in the school of mechanical arts and the Lowell school of practical design. Of the value of the Institute's training, President Walker says: "Here is a case in point: The President of one of the great lines of transportation in this country—a man with a genius for organization and execution—said to me, but a short time ago, that he could take a young man of good sense, good judgment, and good habits, a graduate from our course in civil or mechanical engineering, and, by passing him through the successive grades of responsibility in railroad management, could in five years' time make him a better general superintendent than could be made of a man lacking the preparation in twenty years. The day of half-trained men is past in this country in all occupations—or is rapidly going past."

Precedence at Washington.

Concerning the much discussed question of precedence among ladies in Washington official society, Miss Frelinghuysen is reported to have written as follows in a private note, setting at rest the story of ill-feeling between her mother, Mrs. McElroy, and Mrs. Carlisle: "It seems too bad that what the president intended as a compliment to a new speaker's wife, should be construed as rudeness to my mother, to whom he is studiously polite and most generously considerate. Mrs. Carlisle and we are excellent friends. The receptions of the president my mother has attended, and will always attend; but Mrs. McElroy's Saturday afternoons she has begged to be excused, as she is so weary of standing. The story is foundationless, but has wonderful life and lasts long, because people love to think there is not peace in President Arthur's household."

The Real Ruler of Canada.

The central figure in the Canadian parliament is also the greatest figure in Canada. He is Sir John A. Macdonald, the real ruler of Canada, with but a short interruption, for twenty-five years, and the greatest man British North America has produced. Other politicians are there, a dozen of them, who have been knighted by the queen, but while he is, like them, Knight Commander of the Provincial Order of St. Michael and St. George, he is more than that. He is Knight Commander of the Bath, and, more than that, he is a member of the Imperial Privy Council, which is a distinction enjoyed by no other man in Canada. The others are honorable; he alone is right honorable, like William E. Gladstone. Sir John is 70 years old, and has been a legislator for forty years.

Sham "Duties to Society."

It is a wise and suggestive saying that the Wilkie Collins puts in the mouth of one of his characters; that one may live comfortably on a certain income named, "provided that she does not owe duties to society!" How many a piece of extravagance is excused and glossed over with the plea that really one is obliged to do this or that—that it wouldn't look well not to, etc. But who is really deceived by the excuse or the foolish act itself? There are homes that are made wretched through this notion of duty to society which conflicts with duty to the family. If every woman looked faithfully to her work at home, lived within her means, attended to each real obligation, there would be fewer discontented women vainly seeking for an outlet for their surplus energy.—New York Post.

Farmers Who Are Always On The Move.

The farmer himself is the most fascinating adjunct of a Kansas farm. It is here that the contented steadfastness of the population of the far-Eastern States has met half way the disorder and turbulence of the far West, and the meeting has resulted in a type of character which I believe has not its counterpart elsewhere in the world. His history has usually been somewhat as follows:

He was born and "raised" in Ohio. When he reached man's estate—the estate, by the way, being lacking—he "struck out" for the West and settled perhaps in Indiana. Thence when "things got too thick" he migrated to Illinois, and after a sojourn of a few years in that State he was swept by the tide of emigration into Missouri, where, as he will tell you, "the rebels were too rank," and he soon hitched up the family schooner, embarked the family gods, and crossed into Kansas.

On his travels he has somewhere picked up a companion to whom a certificate, carefully preserved in a frame shows that he has been married by a justice of the peace, and of whom he invariably speaks as "his woman." He and "his woman" have managed to accumulate a family more or less numerous and hungry in the superlative degree, The spirit of unrest that has controlled him heretofore has yielded to the desire of middle life for quiet, and he feels as though he was now settled, and looks forward vaguely to a claim in Colorado or a farm in Iowa when the tendencies of his early days have again gathered force to stimulate him to push on. There is no such thing, however, as contentment among a certain class of young men; they intend to pre-empt "that claim in Colorado before the land is all taken up."

While waiting at a little way station on the Kansas Southern Railroad recently I noticed on the platform a young farmer, I took him to be, who with "his woman" and family of three children seemed to be also waiting for the train.

"Well," I said to him, "are you off for Colorado?"

"No,' said he "Ioway."

"Going to settle there?" I inquired.

"Yes," he replied; "I was up there in September, and I seed a nice little farm that I took a notion to, and so I thought that if I could sell out here for anything like that would cost me I would go and buy. Wall, a fellow came along and offered me $10 an acre for my eighty, and that eighty up thar in Iowav wasn't but $12 an acre, and so I invested."

"Well," said I, "is the Iowa farm a better farm?"

"I dunno as it is any better," he answered "Maybe the buildin's ain't quite so good, but then me and my woman was sorter tired of Kansas, and then she had the shakes, she did, and so we thought we'd move."

"How long have you been in Kansas!"

"Five years going on next April."

"Where did you come from before that?"

"Nebraska."

"Where were you raised?"

"Illinois."

"Well, my friend," said I, "dont you know that you are moving out of the part of Kansas of which Mr. Greeley said that if the Garden of Eden was anything like it Adam and Eve were great fools for ever leaving? According to your own showing you won't better your self any by going; your wife will be as likely to get the chills in Iowa as in Kansas; you are running in debt on your farm; you have all the trouble and expense of moving, and the probability is that it will be years before you are as well off again as you are now."

"Wall," said this specimen of go-ahead-activeness, "my folksdo tell me that a rolling stone don't gather no moss; but I tell them that a settin' hen don't git fat." I had no answer to this, for I had never reflected on the drawbacks which the setting hen may have to encounter.

This restlessness is the most characteristic feature of the Western native farmer of the middle and poorer classes. He is always uneasy, never long satisfied anywhere. He is always going to settle somewhere but can't find the place where he is willing to admit that he means to live and die. He helps to develop an immense amount of country, but can't bring himself to stay long enough to reap the reward of his labor. I was riding along a Kansas country road recently in company with a gentleman who was well acquainted with the community. Of twelve houses which we passed nine, I was told, had been built less than five years, and of these nine, seven were owned by other than the original builders. Four had changed owners twice.

Of course what has been said above does not apply to a very large number of farmers, who are either of foreign birth or have brought with them from homes in the far Eastern States traditions of perseverance and contented industry. The Germans are proverbial everywhere for taking the most unpromising upland claims and sticking to them till they blossom, if not with the rose, certainly with yearly crops of Indian corn, which are the admiration and the envy of the possessors of the most fertile farms on the bottoms and along the creeks.—Burlington (Kan.) Letter.

Burning Church Bonds.

New York World.

A meeting of the congregation of the First Presbyterian Church of Yonkers was held Thursday evaning, at which William Allen Butler presided. Mr. Walter L. Law was present and offered to pay off the bonded indebtedness of the church parsonage, amounting to $10,000 on condition that the present pastor's salary be increased $600, making it $4,100, together with the use of the parsonage. Resolutions were adopted accepting the generous offer and complying with the conditions. John Olmsted, President of the Board of Trustees, handed a certified check for $10,000 from Mr. Law to William Allen Butler, jr., agent of the bondholders. The latter then turned over ten bonds of $1,000 each to Mr. Law, who took them into the study, and in the presence of the Trustees and pastor, the Rev. John Reid, threw them into the fire, A committee was appointed to communicate to Mr. Law the thanks of the church and congregation.

Blazing Abroad.

Electric lighting in Europe is advancing more rapidly than the American public seem to realize. Gas is usually far poorer in quality than here, and modern improvements in making it are slowly adopted. The Bon Marche, at Paris, where 1,500 clerks are employed, tried 400 electric lamps, and has now increased the order to 2,000. The St. Lazare Railway station tried a few lamps in the vestibule, and will now extend the system to the whole vast establishment, covering some twelve to fifteen acres. The Grand Opera House, at Paris, with its 1,100 permanent employes, has a gas bill of $60,000 a year, and it has been experimenting for the past two years with almost every known system of electric lighting, American, or otherwise. In Milan the Manzoni Theater is lighted by electricity, and the vast Theater La Scala now has a complete equipment of engines boilers, and dynamo machines from New York, adequate to 10,000 lamps, in position under the shadow of the great Cathedral, without so much as a wire or a puff of steam in sight from the Cathedral itself.—Electrical Review.

Need of Economy.

One of the hardest lessons in life for young people to learn is to practice economy. It is a harder duty for a young man to accumulate and save his first $1,000 than his next $10,000. A man can be economical without being mean, and it is one of his most solemn duties to lay up sufficient in his days of strength and prosperity to provide for himself and those who are or may be dependent upon him in days of sickness or misfortune. Extravagance is one of the greatest evils of the present age. It is undermining and overturning the loftiest and best principles that should be retained and held sacred in society. It is annually sending thousands of young men and young women to ruin and misfortune.

Cultivate then, sober and industrious habits; acquire the art of putting a little aside every day and for your future necessities: avoid all foolish and unnecessary expenditures. Spend your time only in such a manner as shall bring profit and enjoyment, and your money for such things as you actually need for your comfort and happiness, and you will prosper in your lives, your business, and will win and retain the respect and honor of all worthy and substantial people.

Orientals at Their Meals.

A lady writing from Jerusalem to the Lewiston (Me.) Journal says: Meats generally are boiled and pulled apart with the fingers. Knives and forks are quite unknown. The Arabs are astonished at the skill with which foreigners handle knives and forks. The oriental seizes a piece of meat from the dish with his fingers, tears off the morsel of his choice and puts the rest back into the dish. Or if he has an honored guest, he fingers out a nice piece of meat and insists on inserting it in his guest's mouth. One can easily see how necessary it is to wash one's hands after eating soup with one's fingers! Well, here comes a servant in petticoats, a sort of hungry-looking Esau in a red skull cap and barefooted. He fetches a pitcher and a basin and pours water over our fingers, the water dripping into the basin. So did Elisha, the son of Shapel, who poured water on the hands of Elijah. Jesus, you remember, after the memorable supper of this sort, girded himself with a napkin and did even more menial service—washing not only the guests' hands, but their f et. There could be no higher proof of humility to an oriental mind!

The Explosion of George Francis.

Venal scoundrels! There's blood on the face of the moon! Lizard's leg and gall of goat! Have at it, ye curs! Out damned spot! Whang! Bang! Wh-o-o-p! Miscreants all of ye!—More ink!—Spartan dogs, I hate ye! Roast ye in deep-down gulf of fire! Turn the rascals out! Come on, feeble carrions, all of ye! Carrions, all of ye! Carcasses fit for hounds! Goose-fleshed, fevered lepers and paralyzed imbeciles, I hate ye!—More ink!—Emaciated, horned idiots, pack terriers and gliding ghosts, avaunt! Cap and knee slaves, vapors, minute jacks, naked gulls and dishcloth harbingers of pestilential visits have at it!—More ink!—Green sickness carrion and tallow faced baggage, away! Away! Norwayean banners flout the sky! Carbuncled-backed toads, dove-feathered hogs and canvas-backed hellions pale before me! Turn the rascals out!

Heirs to $20,000,000.

Chicago Tribune.

The Hamburg relatives of an adventurous German emigrant are reported to have fallen heir to a fortune of great magnitude. The story is going the rounds of the German press. Seventy years ago a dissolute young poacher left his native village of Kirchsteinbeck, where he was in bad odor and had frequent difficulties with the police and game-keepers, and embarked for Cape Colony, where he became, in course of time, a prosperous planter and stock-raiser, and the owner of one of the most valuable estates in the settlement. Late in life he sold this property for a large sum, and took up his residence in London. Fortunate speculations there increased his wealth still more, and when he died intestate, some years ago, his property was worth over $20,000,000. Efforts to discover his heirs proved unavailing until recently, and the estate has ever since been waiting for them in Chancery. The people who now inherit this wealth supposed their adventurous relative dead long ago.

A Far-West Restaurant.

"You infernal idiot! Can't you understand plain English? I want a glass of water—water to drink! and I want it quick" said a guest in a Bismark (D. T.) hotel, according to the Tribune of that town. In desperation the waiter hunted up the proprietor and told him the story. The landlord looked puzzled and himself entered the dining room and approached the stranger and said: "Excuse me, sir, but my waiter is a little hard of hearing. I will take your order." "I ordered a glass of water—nothing but straight water." "I'm sorry," replied the landlord, "but I can't accommodate you. There is so little call for those foreign drinks that it dosent pay to keep 'em. We've got some prime Kentucky whisky in the bar, if you can get along on that." The stranger finished his meal in silence.

The Shame of England.

London Letter.—It does seem a shame that a few people should own all the land in this great country, and that while millions can, with the greatest difficulty, eke out scarcely enough to keep them from starving, a privileged number, who never earned a penny in their lives, and many of whose ancestors never did, should be rolling in affluence! No wonder the working classes are beginning to feel dissatisfied. The more the facts are scrutinized the greater will the injustice appear. Twenty-eight dukes in the United Kingdom possess one hundred and fifty-eight separate estates, comprising nearly four million acres. The other members of the peerage, four hundred and ninety-seven in number, hold one thousand four hundred and thirty-five separate estates, embracing about ten million acres. Of thirty-three million acres in England and Wales, more than seventeen million acres are owned by a body of men which probably does not exceed four thousand five hundred. According to Hon. George Brodrick, Warden of Morton College, Oxford, nearly half the inclosed land of England and Wales is owned by about two hundred and fifty persons. The largest landed proprietor amongst the peers is the duke of Sutherland, who owns more than a million acres. His rent roll, however, is not as large as that of some peers with much less property; his income from land amounting to only $656,875, while that of the Marquis of Bute, who owns only one hundred and sixteen thousand acres, is considerably over a million dollars. The Duke of Buccleuch comes second to the Duke of Sutherland in number of acres and second to the Marquis of Bute in size of income. His land comprises four hundred and fifty-nine thousand five hundred and fifty acres, and his rent roll is about $1,100,000. The Duke of North-cumberland's rent roll ranks next, being $880,000 and next to him comes the Duke of Devonshire, with about $25,000 less. The Earl of Derby and Earl Fitzwilliam receive rents amounting annually to about $700,000. Altogether there are ten peers who each receive over $500,000 a year from land.

The Human Face.

Nothing is more wonderful than the human face. At first merely negative, innocent and pretty, as seen in the infant, it responds in the young person to every emotion and passion as quickly and as truly as do the musical chords to the touch; and when, later in life, personal character has become matured and fixed, the face tells to every discriminating observer what that character is.

Some faces are naturally beautiful, yet actually repulsive; others naturally homely, yet actually attractive. We may veil the true face by training it to some artificial expression; but the dominant trait will at times flash into the features, like lightning from a cloud, and betray the secret.

If we would look pure, just, kind, generous, wise and manly, we must virtually be all this in the debts of our being. If we are lustful, grasping, selfish, proud, deceitful, cunning, we cannot permanently keep the face from hanging out the expression that is the horrid sign of these base qualities.

But there are faults of the face which we cannot easily correct, if we take hold of them in time, though even these connect with inner tendencies. We can throw off at will a gloomy look,—where there is no real grief behind it,—and in doing so we shall find the heart itself will be cheered by the effort.

If we are conscious of a look of contempt for our fellows graving its lines about our lips, we can bethink ourselves of its self-conceit and wrongs and check it at its fountain-head.

If we find wrinkles of anxiety forming on our forehead, we can smooth them out by a more child-like trust in the Great Father, If our children are beginning to miss the sunny smile,—and they will be sure to miss it if it is wanting, and will show it, too,—we must unbend oftener from our graver duties, and put ourselves back into loving sympathy with their little world.

As we pass into age, the muscles shrink and harden, and less fat is deposited beneath the skin. Hence the face looses its well-rounded curves of beauty. There then begins—in connexion with a graver habit of thought—a tendency to press the lower jaw strongly against the upper. The bony framework of the jaws contract with age, and the lower part of the face therefore often becomes much distorted, the chin and the nose being brought into unseemly proximity. This tendency to press the lower jaw upward should be resisted.—Youth's Companion.

A Texan Episode.

Recently a Georgian, who had gone to Texas, built a cabin in the woods, and opened a clearing, was charged by a band of strangers with being a murderer. Being innocent, he refused to confess and was dragged some distance into the woods and was tied to a stake. Several shots were fired at him and the shot struck close to him. This failing to frighten a confession from him, he was tortured with knives and finally singed with firebrands. Daylight coming on, his tormentors hurried away, leaving him tied to the stake with a promise that he would be left there until he starved to death. Four days and nights he remained in this situation, without food or drink. He was fast becoming mad, when one night a solitary man, disguised beyond recognition, visited him and gave him water and food. On the seventh night he was as mysteriously set free. On regaining his home to make preparations for flight he learned that the real murderer had been caught and lynched.

No "Abbot Kiss" After All.

From the Kansas City Times.

A few years ago there was much talk about the "Abbott kiss." Now, there is no such thing as the "Abbott kiss;" there never was an "Abbott kiss." The form of osculation was so named by a class of emotional or empiric paupers, who either were constitutionally incapable of comprehending the nature of a true kiss, or whose experience had been so limited that they had not discovered it for themselves. Consequently, when these people beheld the practical illustration of such a kiss on the stage they were forthwith moved among themselves and they exclaimed one to another: "Behold, this is something new and soulful in the way of a kiss. It is altogether different from the conventional lip contacts, the touch-and-go pecks, the resounding 'busses' which we have known among ourselves. Verily, this deserves to be apart from other kisses; let us designate it as the 'Abbott kiss.'"

INTENTIONAL DUPLICATE EXPOSURE

Polk County Journal.

H. E. COOKE, Publisher.

CROOKSTON, - MINNESOTA.

March came in like a lion—will it go out like a lamb?' We shall see. The winter has been more variously trying than usual, and nobody will be satisfied to have it "linger in the lap of spring."

One hundred years ago this month a sumptuous drawing room entertainment was given by Mr. and Mrs. John Jay of New York, the occasion being the blooming of a century plant, belonging to the distinguished entertainers. The list of guests present was preserved and the other day was printed in the New York papers. It is composed principally of brilliant and remarkable people whose names are familiar to readers of revolutionary history; and it is something remarkable that these names are now borne by the most brilliant people in the fashionable and aristocratic circles of New York, with but very few exceptions. A century is not many generations, but it is rare that so many notable names, fortunes and positions have been transmitted with so few interruptions, especially in this country. It is said that "blood will tell"—we know that money will.

The Supreme Court of the United States has again decided the legal tender question, and this time almost unanimously, the only dissentient being Mr. Justice Field. The court holds that congress, as the legislature of the sovereign nations, being expressly empowered by the constitution to levy and collect taxes to pay debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States, and to coin money and regulate the value thereof and of foreign coin, and being clearly authorized as incidental to the exercise of those great powers to emit bills of credit, charter national banks and provide a national currency for the whole people in the form of coin, treasury notes and national bank bills, and power to make notes of the government a legal tender in the payment of private debts being one of the powers belonging to sovereignty in other civilized nations, and not expressly withheld from congress by the constitution, impressing upon treasury notes of the United States the validity of being legal tender in payment of private debts is appropriate means, conducive and plainly adapted to the execution of the undoubted powers of congress consistent with the letter and spirit of the constitution.

Col. P. Donan, a somewhat distinguished editor and orator and now a resident of Fargo, Dakota, but evidently the Courier-Journal of Louisville is misinformed in reporting that he is under contract to write up a series of pen-portraits of the leading types of American beauty for a St. Louis publication, and certainly is when it states that he took a vigorous pull at the saturine bottle, spat upon his hands, and started out in this style: "Britian, whose morning drum-beat sounds around the globe, has but one queen, while we are blest with one or more in every home from ocean to ocean, and from where aurora-borealic fingers paint with weird, mysterious splendors the Dakotan skies, to where the billowed sunshine of the Mexican gulf chants its ceaseless anthem to Floridian shores of everlasting green and gold. • The ancient Jew was ruled by a theocracy; we, both Jew and gentile, bow beneath the flower-wreathed, silk-lined yoke of a resistless sheogracy. Matchless in grace. Marvelously gifted in woman's grand endowment—tongue." The language of the above extract may resemble Col. Donan's ornate diction, but whether it is truthfully attributed to him or otherwise, one thing is certain that Col. Donan never "takes a vigorous pull at the saturine bottle" upon any occasion whatever.

There has been a striking illustration recently of the efficiency of the civil-service law, showing how much the system does to recognize merit. There recently came to Washington from New York a gentleman who had been the principal of a high school, but who, on account of his health, was obliged to abandon teaching. He did not know a person in Washington. He passed a high examination under the civil-service rules, and on one of the first eligible lists was certified to the war department. He was accepted on his examination papers and placed at a desk in the Quartermaster's office. In about two weeks a vacancy occurred in a $1,200 grade. Although he had passed an examination for that grade he had only been appointed to a $900 position. The chief of the office was so pleased with his work and his industry that he promoted this New York school teacher to the vacant $1,200 place. The other clerks in the office at once asked him who his "backer" was, and insisted that he must have "powerful influence", as so rapid a promotion had never been known, In a few weeks more his efficiency and diligence was so marked that when a vacancy occurred in the Secretary's office where a person was needed as a corresponding clerk, his name was mentioned as well fitted for the place, and he was at once promoted to that position, and now holds it to the satisfaction of his superiors. This New York school teacher, unknown to the politicians, could probably never have received his appointment under the old system.

The Moscow Gazette points out the importance of the removal from Paris to Berlin of Prince Orloff, the Russian embassador, and says Orloff possesses the special confidence of the czar and Emperor William; that Europe requires guarantees of security, and that one of the best of these is the entente between Germany and Russia.

Mr. and Mrs. G. P. R. Healey with their two daughters are in Washington for a stay of six weeks, and are settled in Highland terrace. Mr. Healey is a remarkably well-preserved man, and though seventy, looks many years younger. He has just finished a fine portrait of Representative Washburn of Minnesota. He has also a portrait of E. B. Washburne, ex-minister to France.

It is believed here that some congressional action will have to be taken to prevent explosives from being shipped from this country to England for the use of the Irish secret societies against the British authorities. All congress can do will be to pass some stringent regulation forbidding the exportation of explosives, and then provide for the enforcement of the same by rigid inspection.

The entire clerical force of the census bureau, 105 in number, has been suspended from the 10th inst., owing to the exhaustion of the appropriation for the maintenance of the bureau. The superintendent, chief clerk and one clerk are not included in the number, as a sufficient sum remains to pay their salaries a fortnight longer, when it is hoped the deficiency appropriation bill will be passed.

Mr. Halstead, who is in Washington, called to see Mr. Blaine the other day. The latter gave the friendly journalist to understand that he was not in the presidential race. "I feel justified in believing," said Mr. Halstead, "that Mr. Blaine meant every word he said. In fact he aspires to be the secretary of the state again. He would like to answer Bismarck's letter on the Lasker resolutions," added the Cincinnati editor, "and what a ringer it would be!"

Washington Special:—Senator Sabin says, that there is nothing in the story regarding his connection with the Taylor's Falls land office matters, and the Mille Lacs Indian reservation. He avoids going sufficiently into the subject to tell what he does know in the premises. Mr. McMillan is equally reticent regarding the confirmation of Stolberg to the Taylor's Falls land office. He said that he was not allowed to divulge the secrets of the executive session.

Gen. Robinson of Ohio was asked recently how the committee on rivers and harbors were getting on with their appropriation bill. "We are holding meetings every day," he said, "and are getting up a bill on a basis of a total appropriation of $10,000,000. This amount of money will be divided among rivers and harbors whose improvement is actually demanded by the necessity of commerce, but the committee will not reccomend anything for the creeks."

The subject of presenting a Minnesota candidate for governor of Dakota has been agitating the minds of the Minnesota delegation. As yet no one has been agreed upon. Messrs. Nelson and Wakefield have already signed the papers of Mr. Lounsbury, formerly a Minnesotian, but now of Bismarck, Dak. Mr. Lounsbury has a very strong backing in Dakota, and if he could get the Minnesota delegation would be a very strong candidate. Mr. Dunnell is "mentioned" as a probable candidate, but he can hardly control the entire delegation.

The foreign affairs committee has so far taken no part in the controversy arising from the Ochiltree-Lasker resolutions. The matter is before the committee only in the shape of a resolution offered by Mr. Deuster, accepting the action of the German Liberals in thanking the house of representatives for its resolution of condolence. Members of the committee are not disposed to divulge what the general sentiment of the committee is on the subject, but it is believed there is no inclination to take it up. Mr. Deuster, however, denied that an effort is being indirectly made by the German minister to have the committee shelve the resolutions, but Mr. Deuster will urge them upon the attention of the committee and ask action at an early day.

Rail and River Notes.

James Ross, says the Canadian Pacific will resume construction April 1.

The new rates from St. Paul to Devil's Lake, Grand Forks, Larimore, Grafton and St. Thomas, Dak., are reduced to $40 per car; to Fargo, Moorhead, Casselton and Glyndon, $35; to Fergus Falls, Wahpeton and Breckenridge, $30; and to Crookston, Warren, St. Hilaire and Stephen, $40. The reductions range from $5 to $20 per car. The application as to what articles constitute emigrants' movables has been liberally increased, compared with other roads.

The Grand Trunk announces that accounts for the half year ending December show that the 70 per cent. net revenue, accruing to the Grand Trunk, will permit the payment in full of the dividend on the first and second preference shares, and 3¼ per cent. per annum for the half year on third preference shares. The balance carried forward is about £1,000. Thirty per cent. of the revenue accruing to the Great Western share capital covers the payment in full of the dividends on the preference and ordinary stocks, leaving a balance of £4,000 for the reduction of the deficit of the previous half year.

Record of Casualties.

John McGinnis was hanged in the county prison at Philadelphia, for the murder of his mother-in-law, Mrs. Mary Reed. On the scaffold he embraced and kissed the priest. In the middle of a repetition of the sentence, "Jesus, receive my soul," the drop fell. He seemed to die without pain.

For some time trouble has existed between Rev. B. M. O'Boylan of Corning, Ohio, and A. J. McDavitt, a druggist of that place, and who also is a Catholic and has been a member of O'Boylon's church. Sunday night a mob of between forty and fifty men called at the store of McDavitt, and took him three miles in the country, where they exacted promises from him that he would retract what he had said about the priest. The leaders of the crowd have been arrested and a warrant is out for Rev. O'Boylan.

At Massillon, Ohio, Sarah Stark, aged fourteen, applied for the arrest of E. D. Farmer, R Seigner, Charles Fogle and Charles Rite, for rape. She alleges that while going home Wednesday night Farmer waylaid her in a lone spot and forced her to accompany him to a wagon-shed, where he ravished her. The other men accused found them, drove Farmer off, and each in turn twice ravished her, and then escaped. Farmer was arrested and put under $300 bonds for hearing, but was afterward released from custody on bail, and fled. The mayor offers a reward for his capture.

William McMillan, living near Huron, Ohio, went home drunk and abused his wife, who threatened to call on neighbors for help. McMillan swore he would kill the first man who came to the house. Presently George Thompson, aged nineteen, appeared in the dooryard, having an errand at the place and ignorant of the trouble there. McMillan, mistaking him for another person, shot and killed him. Then, discovering his mistake and fearful of discovery, he tried to shoot himself, but only inflicted a trifling flesh wound in a side. McMillan was arrested and jailed at Huron, and was found dead in his cell.

Judge Deady, of the United States circuit court decided that Oregon's mortgage tax law is unconstitutional. The decision favorably affects the Oregon Railway and Navigation, respecting the necessary funds to complete the road and the redemption of a $600,000,000 mortgage.

Several banks in New York and elsewhere have notified Treasurer Wyman that in case they cannot receive United States $1 and $2 notes in exchange for national bank notes sent to the treasury for redemption they will accept standard silver dollars. This action has caused a slight movement of that coin.

The legislative committee of the dominion grange recommends that the finance minister be asked to remove all duties from salt, plaster and other fertilizers; that the duty on agricultural implements be reduced 10 per cent. ad valorem; that present duty on wheat be not removed unless that on flour is also removed.

Ohio raised 60,000,000 bushels of corn last year, against an average of about 100,000,000 in the ten preceding years. Wheat is so shrunk as not to make over 80 per cent. of what the same amount of plump wheat would have made. The corn and wheat products of the state for 1883 have been greatly overestimated.

For a long time past the merchants of the Black Hills country have been, according to their statements, compelled to pay exorbitant rates upon all freight matter shipped from the east. To rid themselves from the bondage efforts are making to establish a route via the Northern Pacific, leaving that road for the Hills at either Dickinson or Medora.

Suits for criminal libel have been entered against the editors of the Uniontown (Pa.) Republican Standard by R. H. Acklin and Lawrence Knott, members of the jury which acquitted Dukes. The alleged libel appeared in the issues of March last, and consisted in great part of headlines. The articles were written on the subject of Duke's acquittal. Damage suits will also be brought by the same parties.

Capt. Nares, who commanded the British Arctic expedition in 1875, assisted by Commander Markham, an officer of the same expedition, has drawn up a memorandum of great value regarding the ice and navigation of Smith's sound. The document has been sent to the American authorities. The Times says: "The Greely search expedition will be watched with as much interest and anxiety by Europe and America as that which went to the relief of Smith in 1881."

March 1, Western Union rates were reduced 25 per cent to the following named states: Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, District of Columbia, Alabama, Georgia, Mississippi, Indian Territory, Kansas, Nebraska, and Arkansas; 20 per cent to Dakota, Indiana, New Mexico, Kentucky, Idaho, Ohio, Missouri, Southern Texas, Utah and Tennessee; 33⅓ per cent to Arizona, British Columbia, California, Montana, Nevada, Oregon, Idaho and Washington Territory.

A sequel to the Sullivan-Robinson knockout on the night of the 6th occurred on the afternoon of the following day at the Baldwin Hotel San Fradcisco. While several of the Sullivan combination, including Steve Taylor, were sitting in the barroom, Robinson and some friends entered. After an exchange of salutations, Taylor made a contemptuous remark to Robinson. The latter retorted, and Taylor led off, hitting Robinson under the ear, knocking him down. They clinched, and a rough-and-tumble ensued. Friends separated them. It is stated that Robinson's expulsion from the Olympic club will be unanimously voted.

The Tagblatt says Sargent will not be recalled till after a new president is elected, when it is possible he will be appointed to St. Petersburg.

Berlin dispatch:—The newspapers still continue their shameful attack upon Minister Sargeant. Never has hospitality, which civilized nations recognize as the inviolable right of foreign representations, been more flagrantly outraged by suborned organs. Representations have been made to the Washington government on the subject.

The Parnellites are irritated at the refusal of the government to reopen the Irish land question, and intend forthwith to begin a great agitation in Ireland and make strong appeals to the Irish to demand the amendment of the land act. They will open subscriptions in behalf of a fund for agitating purposes. Michael Davitt's services will be secured. A conference of the leaders will be held at Easter to discuss a programme.

The lower house of the Prussian landtag has rejected, by a vote of 209 to 152, Windthorst's motion to repeal the law abolishing the salaries of Catholic priests. The government opposed the motion, but would not participate in the debate for fear of exciting party passion. The government desired a peaceable settlement of this question as much as the party of the Center, but differed as to the proper means of securing it.

Lieut. Gov. Richey has received intelligence from Ottawa that the dynamiters are expected to renew their attempts to injure government property there. A number of special constables have been sworn in, and extra precautions will be taken day and night. The provincial building and the residence of the lieutenant governor have special guards, and sentinels at the navy yard are instructed to use extraordinary vigilance.

A dispatch to the Morning News from Havre says: There are thirty Irish-American Fenians here. The dynamite factory between Armiens and Boulogne is strictly watched. It is stated that the alleged informer, McDermott, who is in Paris, has offered to give valuable information for the English police. He will do so at the risk of his life, as the Clan na Gael declare they will assassinate him. A special agent from Dublin is aiding Inspector Moser.

Ottawa Special Telegram: There is great indignation over Sir John Macdonald's bill, introduced to whitewash Sir Charles Tupper, who has, for the past six weeks, been sitting in parliament while holding office under the crown, this being a violation of law. The Tories are so powerful in parliament just now that it would surprise no one if they were to bring in a bill to repudiate the national debt of this country, to which this year has been added over $64,000,000, or at the rate of $16 per head increase.

On the arrival of the steamer City of Chicago at Dublin the remains of Jerome J. Collins and his mother were received by the British admiral, American consul, the mayor and corporation of the city, relatives of the deceased, and a large number of citizens. The bodies were conveyed to the cathedral on biers, followed by a long procession, bearing torches, and a band playing a dead march. The funeral will take place in Cork on Sunday. A guard of honor from her majesty's ship Revenge will escort the remains to Cork.

The police of London are searching for dynamite in all directions, as it is believed that bags of explosive material have been deposited in various quarters of the city. A suspicious party known to be an American, was noticed lingering in the neighborhood of Windsor castle. The Clanna Gael is expected on St. Patrick's day to substitute the knife for dynamite, and some officials may be killed. A box containing galvanic battery and a bottle filled with dark fluid has been found in the railroad station at Western super Mare, a watering place in Somerset, Bristol or channel. The box was ornamented with skulls and cross-bones. The galvanic battery was wrapped in a copy of the Bristol Journal.

The organized action of anarchists and dynamiters was agreed upon without a special treaty. The police departments have been instructed to co-operate. The Swiss government has ordered the arrest of a number of anarchists at Berne, and a search of the domiciles of suspected persons, and the office of a workingmen's society at Berne. The Swiss police arrested a German anarchist named Kernel. They sent information to Vienna which led to the seizure of Kammeror and other anarchists. Refugees at Geneva, suspected a man named Penkart, a rampant anarchist speaker, to be a German spy. Penkert received a warning and suddenly disappeared. Letters opened by the police and afterward sent to their destination will bear an official seal with a mention of the fact.

The German reichstag opened recently with the usual formalities. The speech from the throne asserts the chief task of the reichstag lies in the domain of social and political affairs, and says the emperor's wish, which has been solemnly and repeatedly expressed for the improvement and condition of the workmen, has met with full appreciation on the part of the German people. Among the numerous bills announced is one providing a scheme for accident insurance. After its adoption the emperor recommends the formation of a system of insurance for the infirm and aged. This is intended to prevent any possible justification of the attempts to overthrew the divine and human order of things, and will pave the abrogation of the existing exceptional measures. A bill will be introduced providing that the antisocialist law shall remain in force for a further period, and that he will propose an amendment to present a system of insurance against sickness.

Future Action of the Suffragists.

At the session of the Woman Suffrage association in Washington, a plan for future action was mapped out and agreed upon. It was decided to hold conventions the coming year under the auspices of the association in every state and territory not now organized for woman's suffrage and that upon the vice presidents of the order should devolve the superintendency of what is known as legislative work in their respective states and territories. This legislative work consists in endeavors to secure the adoption by state and territorial legislatures and recommendations to their representatives in congress, of the proposed sixteenth amendment, to give freedom of the ballot to women. It was also decided to use all resources at the hands of the association to defeat any presidential candidate, by whatever party nominated, who is opposed to women suffrage. The views of several candidates on this question are to be obtained by officers of the association.

Maj. Strait was before the subcommittee of the appropriations committee of Congress on Monday the 3rd, and had an item of $70,000 inserted in the Indian bill for the Medewacouton Sioux living in Minnesota, for their maintenance and education. These Indians are now living along the Minnesota river, and are really entitled, Mr. Strait says, to a portion of the annuities made for the support of the Sioux Indians, but rather than remain upon their reservation in Nebraska, have chosen to sever themselves from the tribal relations and adopt the customs of the whites. A portion of them are now occupying land of their own in Minnesota. This is in keeping with what is recommended by the secretary of the interior for the civilization of the Indians.

The Minnesota Republican Committee.

Gen. R. N. McLaren, chairman of the republican state central committee of Minnesota, who is in Washington, has sent to each member of the committee a call for a meeting on March 28 next, at 2 p. m., at the Merchants hotel, St. Paul. The purpose of the meeting will be to fix the date for calling a state convention to select four delegates at large to represent Minnesota in the national convention at Chicago, June 3 next, and also to nominate a state electorial ticket. Under the call of the national republican committee, this state convention must be called upon not less than twenty days published notice, and held not more than sixty days prior to the meeting of the national convention. The republicans of each of the congressional districts have the option of electing two delegates at seperate conventions, called upon similar notice, and held in the districts at any time within the fifteen days next prior to the meeting of the state convention, or by subdivision of the state convention into district conventions, and such delegates will be chosen in the latter method if not elected previous to the meeting of the state convention. PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS.

In the senate on the 3d inst. a resolution was adopted instructing the committee on territories to investigate the alleged assumption, by the clerk of the territorial council of New Mexico of the right of passing upon the electoral qualifications of the members of that body. All the bills on the calendar providing for the erection of public buildings were passed. They include sums for buildings at Winona, Lacrosse and Oshkosh.

When these measures were disposed of Senator Logan called up the military academy appropriation bill, but at the same time the clerk of the house presented the resolutions recently adopted by that body in memory of Congressman Haskell, and Senator Ingalls took the floor to move the concurrence of the senate. Ingalls is one of the most eloquent and polished orators in the senate, and his tribute to Haskell, who was a warm and devoted friend, was one of his best efforts. He was followed by Merrill, Cockrell and Plumb, when the senate adjourned as a mark of respect.

In the house a resolution, offered by Mr. Washburn, was adopted instructing the naval committee to investigate all affairs connected with the Jeanette expedition. This was at the instance of Dr. Collins, brother of Jerome Collins, one of the men lost with De Long. Bills were introduced prohibiting the importation of pauper laborers; to liquidate the national war debt in gold and silver, discontinue the collection of internal revenue, establish a merchant marine and other purposes. By a vote of 227 to 46, the rules were suspended and the bill pensioning survivors of the Mexican war passed.

Mr. Cox (N. Y.) moved that the house adjourn, his purpose being to prevent Mr. Converse from making a motion to suspend the rules and consider the bill increasing the duty on wool.

Mr. Beach called for the yeas and nays, which were not ordered, and a vote of tellers resulted—104 to 46 in favor of adjournment.

In the senate on the 4th inst., among the memorials presented was one by Mr. Ingalls, from a Grand Army post of Kansas, against the passage of a bill reinstating Fitz John Porter. The memorial embodies resolutions of the post which declare that "to reinstate Fitz John Porter would be regarded as an insult to all loyal soldiers who obeyed with alacrity their superior officers." In presenting the memorial, Mr Ingalls remarked that the resolutions voiced the opinion of nine-tenths of the surviving soldiers of the war of the rebellion, and in that opinion he personally cordially concurred.

Mr. Logan, military affairs, reported favorably the bill to relieve the members and judge advocate of the Fitz John Porter court martial of the secrecy imposed by their oath as to the vote of the court.

At the conclusion of the morning business, the military academy appropriation bill was placed before the senate.

Mr. Logan said he was authorized by the committee on appropriations to offer an amendment, providing that hereafter any cadet dismissed for hazing should not be eligible for reappointment. He had consulted many of the best officers who had been in authority at the academy. It was their and his opinion that hazing cannot be stopped without such provision, and he believed such provision would stop it. The amendment was agreed to, and the bill, as amended passed.

Mr. Cockrell reported adversely the bill to authorize the secretary of war to lend tents for the fifth annual reunion of soldiers and sailors of the Northwest at Chicago in August. In presenting this report, Mr. Cockrell remarked that there were no tents that could be supplied for such a purpose, and it would be an enormous expense to the government to undertake to provide them.

The following bills were introduced and referred: By Mr. Vest, to provide permanent reservations for Indians in Northern Montana. By Mr. Sherman granting copyright to newspapers.

The following is a copy of the bill introduced by Senator Sherman, granting copyright to newspapers:

Be it enacted, etc., That any daily or weekly newspaper, or any association of daily or weekly newspapers published in the United States, or any of the territories thereof, shall have the sole right to print, issue and sell for a term of eight hours, dating from the hour of going to press, the contents of said daily or weekly newspapers, or collection of news of said newspaper association exceeding one hundred words.

Sec. 2. That for any infringement of copyright granted by the first section of this act, the party injured may sue in any court of competent jurisdiction and recover in any proper action damages sustained by him from persons making infringement, together with the costs of the suit.

In the house almost the entire day was consumed in committee of the whole upon the naval appropriation bill, but without definite action.

Mr. Strait introduced in the house a bill for the relief of James H. Bacon and L. Caskey. A bill was introduced by Mr. Wakefield for the relief of George F. Brott. Mr. Nelson introduced a bill to restore to certain scouts and soldiers of the United States army the money and annuities belonging to them confiscated and orfeited to the United States, for the relief of ersons for damages sustained by reason of epredations and injuries by certain bands of Sioux Indians, approved Feb. 6, 1883. He also introduced a bill to authorize the sale of timber n certain lands reserved for the use of the Menomonee tribe of Indians in Wisconsin. A bill was introduced by Mr. White for the relief of Charles R. Blair, postmaster at Eyota, Olmsted county, Minn. Gen. Washburn introduced a bill granting pension to Mrs. Farquhar, widow of Col. Francis U. Farquhar.

The senate on the 5th inst., passed a bill to extend the limits of the Yellowstone Park to a ertain extent. The same laws which now exend over the park are re-enacted, and the folwing provision in regard to leasing eights to rivate citizens is included in the bill:

That the secretary of the interior may lease mall portions of ground in the park, not exeding ten acres in extent for each tract, on hich may be erected hotels and the necessary -buildings, for a period not exceeding ten ars; but such lease shall not include any of geysers or other objects of curiosity or inest in said park, or exclude the public from free and convenient approach thereto, or lude any ground within one-fourth of a mile any of the geysers or the Yellowstone Falls; shall there be leased more than one tract, of exceeding ten acres, to any one person, asciation or corporation; nor shall any hotel or r building be erected within the park until lease shall be executed by the secretary of e interior; and all contracts, agreements or lusive privileges hereafter made or given in rd to said park, or any part thereof, inconent with this act are hereby declared to be alid; nor shall the secretary of the interior, ny lease which he may make and execute, nt any exclusive privileges within said park, pt on the ground leased.

e house of representatives has always been of giving the senate a left-hander, and r loses an opportunity to do so. Sometime he senate passed a bill allowing each memf that body a private secretary whose salhall be paid out of the government funds. expenses of the investigations of the Danmassacre and the Copiah county outrage her with the salaries of these new private taries exhausted the contingent fund of enate, and two weeks ago the senate passed solution appropriating $10,000 more for purposes. This required the concurrence e house, which has been withheld, when Randall reported the resolution with an ndment, which was passed, permitted the y to be used only to pay the expenses of vestigation. This cuts off the wages of rivate secretary's.

was rumored on the 6th inst., that the senwere quite stirred up by what they conthe interference of the house of represenwith the disbursement of their continfund, and declare that the action of the committee on appropriations in tacking amendment which prohibits the payment aries to their recently appointed private aries an unwarranted impertinance. The bers of the house justify their action on round that the senate has never permitted e house to pay its employes as ich as the senate employes eive and insist that as long as the senators to have secretaries to do their private iting, the government should not be comlled to pay for the luxury. It is an open andal that the worst sort of nepotism has en practiced by the senators in the selection their private secretaries under the new rule, d that the pay clerk of that body had been bidden to disclose the names of the persons employed. It is claimed that the wives and ughters of certain senators are drawing $6 lay from the government under the guise of private secretaries, and the attempt to conceal the facts in the case gives color to the report.

The bill providing a system of courts for the United States in the far east passed the senate likewise the bill appropriating $200,000 for Col. Aldert H. Emery for inventing and constructing a machine for testing iron and steel.

The house passed the naval appropriation bill with some amendments. Up to the very close of the discussion the general topic of a new navy was very warmly debated. In the course of the debate Mr. Dorsheimer of New York spoke of the importance of improving the navy so as to make it adequate for the protection of the nation and in case of war with England now, pictured the disastrous consequences to the people of his own district. He said not a house would escape destruction by the guns of a hostile fleet that might anchor three miles off Coney Island and quite outside the reach of fortifications in New York.

The senate took up for consideration the bill for the relief of the heirs of Maurice Grivot. The bill provides for the repayment to the heirs of about $700, constituting a deposit seized by order of Gen. Banks in New Orleans on his taking possession of that city. Mr. Conger strenuously opposed the bill upon the ground that it was the entering wedge for a large number of claims of similar character. If congress commenced to pay such claims it would be called upon in a voice it could not misunderstand to stop it. A protracted debate ensued. A motion by Mr. Ingalls to indefinitely postpone was voted down, and the bill passed—40 yeas to 9 nays.

Although the bill to place Gen. Alfred Pleasanton on the retired list as colonel was favorably acted upon by the house in committee of the whole, last Friday, it was defeated Saturday, on the attempt of Mr. Bayne, of the military committee, to secure its passage. Mr. Steele of Indiana moved to recommit, which was carried by a yea and nay vote of 122 to 115. The result was not so much from any hostility toward Gen. Pleasanton or belittling his distinguished services, as from the honest conviction in many minds that it was bad precedent. There are a good many officers of the late war who might come in the category with Gen. Pleasanton.

Democratic Campaign Committee.

The democratic congressional campaign committee met in Washington on Monday evening, the 3d, and organized for the coming campaign. The following executive committee was appointed:

On the Part of the Senate—Senators Garland, Kenna and Gorman.

On the Part of the House—Representatives Paige, Rosecrans, Stockslager, Stevens and Murphy.

The following is a full list of the campaign committee, as at present organized:

Big Robbery in Chicago.

Last Saturday about 1 o'clock in the afternoon Paymaster C. S. Bartlett, of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy railroad, left his office for lunch without taking the precaution to lock the combination of the big safe, in which the moneys for the payment of the employes were deposited. On leaving the room he did so without waiting the return of other attaches of the office, who had gone to lunch. Before his return the safe was robbed of all its contents except some packages of nickels and some small change, the total amount disappearing, as nearly as can be estimated, being $27,000. On the facts becoming known an investigation was had, and Paymaster Bartlett was discharged from the service of the company for negligence, and the affair was placed in the hands of the detectives. An effort was made to keep the matter secret in the hopes that the detectives would thereby be facilitated in their work, but the affair becoming known and in the belief that exaggerated statements would be published concerning the robbery, the officials showed a willingness that the exact facts be furnished the public. The theory advanced by the treasurer of the company is that the robbery was accomplished by a sneak thief.

RETRIBUTION.

Frank Rande, the Perpetrator of a Dozen Murders Hangs Himself in the Joliet Prison.

Joliet, Ill., Special; Frank Rande hanged himself to his cell door on the night of the 7th inst. By means of his undershirt and suspenders he made a rope and fastened them to the bars of the door. He then placed his coat and vest over the iron work of the door to shield his body from the chilly touch of the iron and at the bottom of the door he placed his cell bucket bottom upward under which lay his pants to deaden the sounds of his struggles when dying. When the keeper opened the door in the morning the body had a very natural appearance except the face, which was rapidly turning black. Yesterday afternoon Warden McCloughrey paid a visit to the cell of Rande and conversed with the wretch for a few moments. Rande had not been informed that Duputy McDonald was in a fair way of recovering, and was under the impression that his cruel blow had killed him. Rande seemed glad to see him, and greeted him with:

"Hello, Major! You are just the man I want to see. I want you to send to Peoria for Frank Hitchcock, formerly the sheriff, and to Galesburg for State Attorney Tannicliff, and when you three men are here in this cell before me, I will tell you something wonderful."

The warden did not reply to him, but as he was passing out of the cell Rande called him back and begged him to take him out and hang him. "I cannot do that, Rande; but never fear, you will be hung soon enough," was the reply. The warden then left him. At 6 o'clock last evening the guard opened his cell and passed in Rande's supper ration. At that hour the bandit was pacing up and down the cell, talking wildly to himself. The supper was placed inside the door and the cell locked and not opened again until after 7 o'clock this morning, when it was discovered that the "brilliant bandit of the Wabash" had committed at least one decent deed during his career, in ending his life without troubling the officers of the law. Frank Rande's real name was Charles C. Scott. He was born in Pennsylvania in 1839, his father being Malachi Scott, now living at Fairfield, Iowa, where he settled thirty years ago. His wild career of crime is fresh in the recollection of the public.

The past week has shown some activity in preparations for grading, and Col. Peteler, the Minneapolis railway constructor and grading car builder, has received orders for twelve cars to go to Belle Plaine, Iowa; twenty-four cars to be shipped to Cartwright, Wis., for work on the new Sault Ste. Marie railroad; also 2,000 feet of his T rail portable track, switches and curves, and nine cars for work in West St Paul.

Land Legislation.

Washington, Special Telegram, March 5.—The proposed public land legislation by congress at this session is of special interest to settlers of Dakota. Maj. Strait's bill reducing the price of public lands within the limits of railroad land grants is of the greatest concern to the settlers who expects to pay for his land. At present he pays $400 for 160 acres, but under Mr. Strait's reduction bill he would pay $200, or $1.25 per acre. Settlers and others friends along the line of the Northern Pacific in Dakota are pouring in letters upon senators and representatives asking their support of the reduction. They claim it is an unjust discrimination against and burden upon the settlers who happens to locate within forty miles of a land grant railroad; that the government ought not to compel the homesteader to pay for the lands donated to the railroad; that the treasury is already full of money, and that the tax of $2.50 is unnecessary and positively injurious to both settler and country. Delegate Raymond has also an important bill before the house land committee, providing that homestead settlers who appear to be the class who go west to stay be allowed one year from date of entry at the local land office within which to build a house and do at least before being actual residences. A letter to Senator Hawley from one of his old constituents in Dakota, says this one-year stipulation is universally commended by the homesteaders in his vicinity. It gives the new farmers a chance to get ready for a crop before he is obliged to commence a continuous residence, and hold out substantial encouragement to settlers with families, who are loth to endure the unnecessary and impractical conditions exacted by the homestead law as it exists. Mr. Raymond's bill also permits a winter's absence where the settlers desires it for the purpose of securing employment. Suggestions are reaching Maj. Strait that claimants under the timber culture act be restricted to actual settlers of the township where the land subject to entry under that act is located, and that the area be made eighty acres instead of 160. Thus two claims are allowed in each section where there is now only one. The non-residents are reported as total failures in raising trees. They cannot make delegated labor a success. The pre-emption law will undoubtedly be repealed, after eliminating the speculative elements from the public land laws, in the interest of bona fide settlers. Such a provision as outlined in this dispatch will be productive of great good.

FIVE ACRES OF BREAKING

Death of Judge Waite of Minnesota.

Hon. Franklin Waite died in Mankato, Blue Earth county last Tuesday, the 4th, aged seventy-one years. Judge Waite was born in Windham county, Vt., in February, 1813. When a boy he moved with his parents to Jamestown, N. Y. He, early in life, showed a preference for the profession of law, and at the age of twenty-three was admitted to practice in the supreme court of the state of New York. Five years later he was appointed judge of the court of common pleas, which profession he held until that office was abolished. During Polk's administration he was the postmaster at Jamestown. Afterward he moved west and located in Fond du Lac, Wis., where he practiced in his profession. He went to Mankato in 1860. In 1867 he was elected to the state senate, and in 1869 he was elected judge of the Sixth judicial district of this state and for five years he filled that position most impartially and satisfactorily, and with distinction. Ill health caused him to resign.

Kidney Complaints.

The kidneys form a very important channel for the outlet of disease from the system, carrying off accumulations that poison the blood. As the lungs remove the carbonic acid, the liver the biliary acid, so the kidneys remove the uric acid. The undue accumulation of this acid is the poison that often produces rheumatism and other chronic diseases. The kidneys are often affected and cause serious disease when least suspected. If there is weakness, heat or pain in the back or loins, weariness, nervous restlessness, and any unnatural condition of the urine, a hot dry skin, and hectic flushes, bloating of the body or swelling of the limbs, annoying headaches, obstructed circulation, with sediment or gravely or albuminous deposits in the secretion from the kidneys; or if that secretion be either extremely pale or high colored, then the kidneys are evidently not doing their natural work. Many suffer from serious kidney trouble without knowing what ails them. No matter in what form the kidney complaint may exist there is no better purifying regulating diuretic and tonic, than Burdick's Blood Bitters; its action upon the kidneys is at once manifested. Working upon this and all other channels of purification in a prompt and permanent manner.

Death of Kenneth Raynor.

Hon. Kenneth Raynor, solicitor of the treasury died in Washington on Wednesday. Mr. Raynor was a native of North Carolina. His home was in Raleigh, until called to Washington by President Hayes, who appointed him to the position he had since held. Politically, he was an old line-Whig before the war, but for many years past he had been identified with the republican party. His wife, who survives him, is a sister of Bishop and Lieut. Gen. Leonidas Polk, of the confederate army, who was killed in front of Atlanta. Mr. Raynor was wealthy before the war, owning an extensive plantation in Mississippi and a large number of slaves. It is related that soon after his inauguration, President Garfield was importuned to remove Raynor to make room for somebody who coveted the place. "No," said the president. "I used to read Raynor's speeches when I was a young man at college, and I was charmed with the eloquence. Now, in the mutation of events, I am president and he is poor, holding a subordinate treasury position. He shall not be removed from the office while I am president."

OUR ANCESTORS' NERVE.

The Secret of Their Unusual Vigor Explained and How it can be Acquired.

There was something about the sturdy vigor of former generations that challenges the admiration of every man, woman and child. They were no epicures—those ancient fathers. They lived simply, and successfully met and overcome difficulties that would have discouraged this age and generation. The rigors of the frontier were supplemented by the savages; wild beasts threatened their enterprise and poverty was a common companion. Yet they bravely encountered and resisted all those things and laid the foundations of a land whose blessings we now enjoy. Their constitutions were strong; their health unsurpassed and yet they were forced to expose themselves continually. There certainly must have been some good and adequate cause for all this and for the physical superiority of that age over the present.

It is well known to everyone conversant with the history of that time that certain home compounds of strengthening qualities were used almost universally by those pioneers. The malarial evils and exposures to which they were subjected necessitated this. When their bodies become chilled by cold or debilitated by the damp mists of a new country they were forced to counteract it by the use of antidotes. Medicines were few in those days, and doctors almost unknown. Hence the preparations above referred to. From among the number, all of which were compounded upon the same general principle, one was found to be more efficient and hence far more popular than all the rest. It was well known through the middle and western states and was acknowledged as the best preparation for malarial disorders and general debility then known. The recipe for compounding this valuable article was handed down from one family and generation to another, was known to the Harrison family and is used as the basis and general formula for the present "Tippecanoe" the name being suggested by the battle in which General Harrison was engaged. The manufacturers have thoroughly investigated this subject in its minutest details, and are certain that for malassimilation of food, dyspepsia, tired feelings, general debility, prostrations, malarial disorders and humors in the blood, nothing can exceed in value "Tippecanoe," which was the medicine of our forefathers and seems destined to be the most popular preparation of the day.

"Tippecanoe" is prepared and given to the public by Messrs H. H. Warner & Co. of Rochester, N. Y., proprietors of the famous Warner's Safe Cure, which is now the most extensively used of any American medicine. The well known standing of this house is sufficient guarantee of the purity and power of this preparation which seeks to banish one of the greatest banes of the nineteenth century—mal-assimiliation of food. Any one who experiences trouble of digestion; who feels less vigor than formerly; whose system has unquestionably "run down" and who realizes the necessity of some strengthening tonic cannot afford to permit such symptoms to continue. If the farmer finds that his threshing machine does not separate the grain from the straw he realizes that something is wrong and tries to repair the machine. When the food does not sustain the life; when it fails to make blood; when it causes the energy to depart and ambition to die, it is a certain sign that something is wrong and that the human machine needs repairing. It is not a question of choice; it is a matter of duty. You must attend to your health or your sickness and nothing will sooner overcome these evils than "Tippecanoe," the medicine of the past a safe guard for the present and a guarantee of health for the future.

The experience in the treatment of Cancer with Swift's Specific (S. S. S.) would seem to warrant us in saying that it will cure this much dreaded scourge. Persons so afflicted are invited to correspond with us.

I beleive Swift's Specific has saved my life. I had virtually lost use of the upper part of my body and my arms from the poisonous effects of a large cancer on my neck, from which I had suffered for 20 years. S. S. S. has releived me of all soreness, and the poison is being forced out of my system. I will soon be well. W. R. ROBISON, Davisboro, Ga.

Two months ago my attention was called to the case of a woman afflicted with a cancer on her shoulder at least 5 inches in circumference, angry, painful, and giving the patient no rest day or night for 6 months. I obtained a supply of Swift's Specific for her. She has taken 5 bottles, and the ulcer is entirely healed up, only a very small scab remaining and her health is better than for 5 years past; seems to be perfectly cured. REV. JESSE H. CAMPBELL, Columbus, Ga.

I have seen remarkable results from use of Swift's Specific on a cancer. A young man near here has been afflicted five years with the most angry looking eating cancer I ever saw, and was nearly dead. The first bottle made a wonderful change, and after five bottles were taken, he is nearly or quite well. It is truly wonderful. M. F. CRUMLEY, M. D., Oglethorpe, Ga.

Thousands Hastened to their Graves!

Relying on testimonials written in vivid glowing language of some miraculous cures made by some largely puffed up doctor or patent medicine has hastened thousands to their graves believing in their almost insane faith that the same miracle will be performed on them, and that these testimonials make the cures, while the so called medicine is all the time hastening them to their grave. We have avoided publishing testimonials, as they do not make the cures, although we have of them, of the most wonderful cures, voluntarily sent us. It is our medicine Hop Bitter's that makes the cures. It has never failed and never can. We will give reference to any one for any disease similar to their own if desired, or will refer to any neighbor, as there is not a neighborhood in the known world but can show its cures by Hop Bitters.

THOUSANDS UPON THOUSANDS

A LOSING JOKE.

A prominent physician of Pittsburgh said to a lady patient who was complaining of her continued ill health, and of his inability to cure her, jokingly said: "Try Hop Bitters!" The lady took it in earnest and used the Bitters, from which she obtained permanent health. She now laughs at the doctor for his joke, but he is not so well pleased with it, as it cost him a good patient.

FEES OF DOCTORS.

The fee of doctors is an item that very many persons are interested in. We believe the schedule for visits is $3.00, which would tax a man confined to his bed for a year, and in need of a daily visit, over $1,000 a year for medical attendance alone! And one single bottle of Hop Bitters taken in time would save the $1,000 and all the year's sickness.

A LADY'S WISH.

"Oh, how I do wish my skin was as clear and soft as yours," said a lady to her friend. "You can easily make it so," answered the friend. "How?" inquired the first lady. "By using Hop Bitters that makes pure, rich blood and blooming health. It did it for me, as you observe."

GIVEN UP BY THE DOCTORS.

"Is it possible that Mr. Godfrey is up and at work, and cured by so simple a remedy?"

"I assure you it is true that he is entirely cured, and with nothing but Hop Bitters, and only ten days ago his doctors gave him up and said he must die, from Kidney and Liver trouble!"

THE TERRIBLE ESPINOSAS.

A Memory Of Early Days In Colorado.—The Mysterious Murders Which Caused a Reign of Terror In The Mining Camps 21 Years Ago.

From the New York Times.

Red Rock Ridge, Col., Feb. 17.—As I sat, last night, in a miner's cabin, about a half-mile below here, in the gulch—the cabin of a miner who has trudged and climbed and prospected these ancient hills for more than 20 years, and, like many others, has fairly less of this world's goods than he began with—the conversation, quite naturally, drifted to the events of "old times" in the mountains. My friend has a vast fund of entertaining incidents relating to his section, and so, after the usual pipe-filling and cheering cup, he inquired if I had ever heard of the Espinosas. Being a comparative tenderfoot, (that is, a new comer,) and quite unfamiliar with the stirring occurrences for which Colorado was in its earlier years noted, I had to confess my utter ignorance of the subject he had broached. As it proved to be an interesting and tragic tale, I will attempt to reproduce it here; but I cannot hope to give it in the uncouth yet forcible words of the bronzed old man who related it.

In 1863 the settlement of Colorado was but 4 years old. The gold excitement had brought into the territory, however, a large, hardy, and peculiar population. Denver (Auraria as it was originally called from the discovery of auriferous deposits in that neighborhood) was but a small cluster of shanties and tents set up for temporary occupancy. Aside from this there were few towns, save in Southern Colorado, where the Mexican element had drifted and established insignificant settlements which could boast of little besides a name. Fresh discoveries of gold were being made, however, and Russell Gulch was fast developing what subsequently became an important mining centre at Central, Black Hawk, and adjacent points. A few hardy pioneers had pushed out beyond and settled Breckenridge, Fairplay, Oro City, while down by the foot-hills, like sentinels to the fastnesses above, were Colorado City, once the capital, before it was removed to Golden; Canon City, Badito, and other mere specks upon the then almost unbroken region. These were all, at best, mere handfuls of people, but all were earnest, determined, hopeful men. The search for gold had led them out from the overcrowded east, and they came to found a future great state.

There was much excitement here then, both from local and outside causes. Rebellion in the southern states, and the development of that spirit here had caused a feeling of great unrest and trouble lurked everywhere. Confederate plans for acquiring this territory were fortunately checked by the vigilant Gilpin at Pigeon Ranch. Indians threatened the borders likewise, and their depredations finally led to Chivington's awful punishment of this enemy at Sand Creek. Desperadoes scourged the mining camps and larger towns until vigilance committees took hold and administered the justice that the law could not. During these troublous days in 1863 an unknown danger came. So mysteriously did it work that for the time it fairly paralyzed the mountain communities. In March nine men had been found dead along the trails near Canon City. Each man had a bullet in his head. So nearly similiar were the death wounds that these mysterious assassinations naturally gave rise to much speculation. And this was increased when it was learned that three weeks before two men had been similarly killed in Santa Fe, and also a soldier in Conejos. Thus as far as could be discovered a bloody trail had its origin in the City of the Saints, in New Mexico, and reached now as far as Canon City. The news of the terrible crimes, of course, spread rapidly, but it could scarcely keep up with their commission. Along the mountain roads dead bodies were found, each with the fatal bullet in his skull. No victim attacked ever told the tale. The rifle that sighted him carried certain death with its missile. Miners trudging their weary way up the mountain trails, teamsters with horses and vehicles, met their fate alike. One singular fact appeared to be this, that all were killed in the wagon roads or on the trails; none were ever found off the beaten paths. Of course, the people became appalled and hardly dared to venture beyond the reach of immediate aid. No one could tell from what concealment the messenger of death—that had never missed the mark might in its turn reach him. Dread despair prevailed; the fear of an unknown foe pervaded the hearts of those pioneers who dared face any danger openly. In fact, a reign of terror prevailed. The assassinations became more frequent. Men would leave their cabins, camps, or the mountain cities for remote sections only to be found, perhaps, a few days later by more fortunate travelers dead, and in their skulls the small hole through which their lives went out.

Finally, a company of 20 volunteers was raised in Park County. Their leader was a man of great bravery, and every man in the party was ready to lay down his life to solve the mystery. The first work this company did was to punish a band of notorious thieves that had been engaged robbing miners' cabins and flumes, and who were well known. But this did not stop the dread work of mysterious murders. At Red Rock Ridge—right here, by the way, where I write this letter—and all along the trail, murdered men were found singly and in pairs. And always the same wound, the same sized bullet, the same trained hand, evidently, had fired the fatal shot.

A few days later the band of volunteers, in scouring the neighborhood, found a trail in the lower part of the South Park that led toward Canon City. It was early in the forenoon when the trail was struck. They at once took it up, and after having traveled some distance in the mountains came about noon upon two horses feeding. This was to them a strange discovery, as this was not a region where prospecting was then carried on. It was the work of a moment to conceal themselves. Shortly after, two men appeared. They had evidently made their camp here for the day, for just beyond the horses a small fire was burning, and beyond doubt they were partaking of their meal. Wily as these men were they had been taken unawares. The scouting party had drawn upon them before they were aware of their presence. Certain that these were the men they sought, and with the memory of their fiendish deeds before them rifles were at once brought to bear and bullets sent speeding on their deathly errands. The larger of the two men fell, but was not killed. Raising himself upon one arm, he fought like a wounded tiger. His unerring aim brought down two of his adversaries before a second bullet struck him and laid him dead. The other man, the younger one, was evidently unharmed by the first volley, for, with the agility of a goat he sprang into the rocks, scrambled away and made his escape.

These two men were the notorious Espinosas, outlaws from Mexico, two cousins. This was discovered when the body of the dead assassin was examined, as well as the saddle-bags, which were found near the fire. In a buckskin bag, suspended about his neck was an illiterate Spanish manuscript written by the elder Expinosa. It consisted of a singular prayer and what was evidently intended as a statement of the purpose for which he had set out upon this mission of blood. From these it was learned that he had begun as a religious monomaniac. His father it appeared had been guilty of murder, and, so ran the manuscript, this present elder Espinosa had been impelled by his patron saint to commit these deeds for the purpose of expiating the father's sins which had been visited upon him. To do this he was to number 50 victims, and to go on, on, on until this was done—but all his victims, must be white men. Not until this was accomplished could he hope to merit favor from his ruling spirit; never would its smile fall upon him and his father's sin be atoned until this were done. With this task before him, he enlisted a cousin in his cause, and together they started north from Chiahuahua. It was a trail of blood they left behind them. From a record the elder Espinosa had kept he had at that time murdered 30 white men, 27 of of whom had been killed in Colorado, after leaving Conejos. He was a large, coarse, hard-visaged ruffian, while his companion was small, and, near as could be judged by those who saw him on the day of the encounter, of no particular individuality.

It was evident that gain had played no part in this mission of the elder Espinosa. None of the bodies of his victims has been robbed, as had been noted by the people of the neighborhood where they were found from time to time. The arch assassin was meanly clad in buckskin, and there was nothing in his saddle-bags beyond what has already been mentioned, save ammunition. Murder alone was the object of this maniac.

The scouting party searched several days for the younger Espinosa, but without success. No trace of him was ever found. The head of the dead outlaw was cut from the body, and was taken back to Fairplay as a trophy of the remarkable chase. For years the skull was in the possession of a well-known physician in southern Colorado, while a knife the assassin carried was long preserved among the territorial properties. His rifle, which had carried death to so many victims, can be seen any day in Denver in the home of an old mountaineer, then poor, but who is now one of the mining kings of the state.

Homesickness a Fatal Disease Among Soldiers in the Civil War.

Washington Letter in Philadelphia Record.

"Do you know that many soldiers died of homesickness during the late war?" said an ex-federal colonel. "Yes, sir; they called it nostalgia—that's the medical term for homesickness. Men died apparently without a cause—not from fright; homesickness was the cause in nine cases out of ten. I remember that at one time I was in charge of a depot at Louisville, Ky., where 16,000 convalescents were waiting for strength to go to the front. I noticed that many of them grew worse instead of better. It puzzled the surgeons. It was not due to a relapse; it was not the old disease at all. It did not seem to be a new disease. I looked into it a little and then told the surgeon that it was nothing but nostalgia. I had a chance to prove that I was right. One of these sick well men came to me next day. "Colonel," he said, "I want a leave of absence for a day or two. I want to go home and see my folks. I am pining away for a sight of my old home. I believe I shall die if I don't go.' On inquiring I found that his home was right across in Indiana, and that he had an idea that he could see the smoke rising from its chimney. He had not been home for several years, and he was fretting away in sight of that smoke. I was not supposed to let any of my convalescents go anywhere except to the front, but I determined to try an experiment with this sallow, peaked-faced young man. 'Well, sir,' I said, 'how long will you be gone?' 'This is Friday,' he replied; 'I will be back on Monday.' 'No,' I said; 'you can stay until Friday of next week.' 'All right,' he said, looking better already. On the next Friday he returned a new man. 'I'm all right again colonel,' he half shouted when he saw me; 'I'm ready to go to the front at once. I went home, saw my mother and father and my sisters and brothers, had some good home food and some good home sleep, and fought all my battles over again down at the village store. That was all that I wanted.' It was the fact. He had been cured of nostalgia."

Sad Sensation in Illinois.

For almost a year Miss Ida Wallace, daughter of Prof. Wallace, one of the leading citizens of Columbus, Ill., and a professor of the schools at that place, has been teaching school a short distance in the country. Not coming to her supper Tuesday night a search was made for her, and she was found in the school house almost dead with grief and pain, having given birth to a child which to conceal her shame she had thrown into the stove. A portion of the body was found which had escaped the flames. She was taken home, and now lies in a very critical condition. Her family and friends comprise the wealthiest and most cultured citizens. Nothing certain is known of the identity of her betrayer.

Congressman Strait has introduced a bill which, in effect, provides that where a contest is pending in a land case, the party succeeding in proving that he is entitled to the land, may make his final proofs without any more notice. He also introduced a bill for the relief of William S. Graw, E. Parliman, and James W. Schaunburg.

Personal Matters.

"The only misgiving I had when I left the cutter," says Lieutenant Rhodes, the Gay Head hero, "was about my baby. You didn't know that I had one, did you? He is a bright little boy about two years old. His mother died some time ago, and as I left in the boat I called out to the captain to look out for him if anything happened to me."

Mr. Bradlaugh's brother is as pious a Christian as he is the reverse. He began a mission at Exeter the other day, and in the course of his opening address said he had complete faith in the ultimate conversion of his brother, and would not be surprised to receive at any moment intelligence that the great infidel had come over to the Lord.

Queen Victoria, it is said by German papers, will leave England in the beginning of March in her yacht Osborn, for Flushing. After remaining in her villa near Baden-Baden until April, she will go to Darmstadt to be present at the marriage of her granddaughter, Princess Victoria, to Prince Louis von Battenbert. The Queen will return to England at the end of April, after a visit to the Riviera.

Sir Stafford Northcote has been amusing a literary society by lecturing upon the subject of "Nothing" though he reminded them that he was not the first person who had attempted to discuss that theme. Lord Rochester, the friend of Charles II, addressed a very clever poem to "Nothing;" a French writer, quoted by Dr. Johnson, wrote a Latin poem to show that Nothing is purer than water, Nothing is richer than gold, Nothing is higher than the heavens, and so on. The speaker defined masterly inactivity as the art of sitting still and not committing yourself in any action at a time when it is not convenient you should do so.

A few months since the wife of Rev. "Adirondack" W. H. H. Murray, formerly of Boston, received the degree of M. D. from the University of Vienna after passing a very creditable examination. Mrs. Murray has taken a house in New Haven and intends to practice her profession.

Musto Hitod, Emperor of Japan, who is now 32 years old, is the 123d sovereign of that country. He has reigned since the death of his father, in 1867. His is the only dynasty that has ruled in Japan, and began 660 B. C. There is no other monarch in the world who can boast so unbroken a descent from so ancient a stock.

The most exciting leap-year incident so far reported is that which comes from St. Elmo, Ill. It appears that while the Rev. Mr. Pierce, a young divine, was occupying his pulpit in St. Elmo, Mrs. Mary Smith, a dashing young widow, left her seat in the body of church and went up and stood beside him. To the astonishment of the congregation she announced that she was about to become Mrs. Pierce. She had, it is rumored, become infatuated with the young divine, and to this and the excitement of a religious revival, at which she was converted, her temporary insanity is attributed.

Mr. A. M. Broadley, the legal defender of Arabi Pasha, has rooms in the Temple, London, furnished in strange contrast to the remainder of that sombre, dingy, and prosaic precinct. Their entrance is a Saracenic archway, hung with a Tunisian portière, and within are Shiraz carpets, divans, colored lamps, velvet wall-hangings, blazoned with Koran texts—once palls covering the catafalque over the grave of the Sidi Ben Awill, who was buried in Kairwan nearly 1,200 years ago—and a host of brilliant, quaint, and curious tokens of North Africa and the Orient.

Earl Grosvenor, the eldest son of the Duke of Westminister, who has just died, was chiefly remarkable for his greatness, for his age, immense size; his habit, which probably occasioned this size, of staying in bed until three in the afternoon, and his passion for engine driving. He had been subject from one-and-twenty years and upward to epileptic attacks, but when on the engine "Will Irishman" was always accompanied by the usual driver and stoker, so that the public suffered no risk. His young widow is one of the beautiful daughters of Lord Scarborough, and their little boy, Lord Belgrave, who is destined to inherit the vast estates, is a fine little fellow, called in the family "Ben d'Or," after his grandfather's Derby winner.

Things in General.

The battle of Waterloo was fought June 18, 1855 (which fell on a Sunday), between the French troops, under Napoleon Bonaparte, and the combined forces of England, Germany and the Netherlands, commanded by the Duke of Wellington. It resulted in the absolute overthrow of Napoleon, and the Bourbon kings were restored to the French throne. The battle-field is situated in Belgium, about two miles from the village of Waterloo, and twelve miles south of Brussels.

An American woman said that her husband would sit on a barbed-wire fence all the afternoon and never flinch or move a muscle to see a base ball match or an agricultural "hoss trot," but that when he went with her to church he couldn't sit still in a soft-cushioned pew fifteen minutes without wriggling and squirming all over the seat.

An Atlanta Constitution correspondent says: "The other night while talking to United States Senator Brown, I noticed a piece of rabbit fur protruding above his collar. I asked him if he wore a rabbit's foot about his neck. 'No,' he replied, 'but I do wear a rabbit skin on my chest. A lady recommended it as the best possible protection against cold. I got a fine rabbit skin, cut off the feet, and, tying the two legs together with a ribbon, I tied the skin about my neck. It has worked like a charm."

A New Hampshire correspondent writes: In Warner there is a school district in which fifty years ago there were some forty scholars, and now there is but one. For a distance of 2½ miles on a traveled road in the south part of the town, where sixty years ago there were thirty homesteads, cultivated by their owners, with families in the district. "In those days large herds were seen on every hand, now there are none.

The people of Boston have organized and opened what they term "The People's Church" in that city. It is much after the form of the Moody church in Chicago. It accommodates 2,500 people, with accommodations for 750 more in adjoining chapel, which can be united with the main audience-room by the throwing open of doors. The seats are arranged in semi-circular form on a gradually sloping floor, like those in a theater, and folding chairs are substituted for pews. Attached to the church is a parsonage. All the seats are free, and membership in the church "rests on a broad and catholic basis."

The old house in which General Grant was born, at Point Pleasant, O., came very near being carried away by the floods during the recent overflow. Clermont County, in which Point Pleasant is situated, is almost surrounded by the Ohio and the Little Miami Rivers, and when the overflow occurred acres of land were submerged. The waters rose to within a short distance of General Grant's old home, and for a time threatened to carry it away, but, fortunately subsided before any damage was done.

Some idea of the magnitude of the business of raising sweet-scented flowers for their perfume alone may be gathered from the fact that Europe and British India consume about 150,000 gallons of handkerchief perfumes yearly; that the English revenue from eau de cologne is $40,000 annually, and that the total revenue of other perfumes is estimated at $200,000 annually. There is one great perfume distillery at Cannes in France which uses yearly 100,000 pounds of rare flower leaves, 32,000 pounds of jasmine blossoms, 20,000 of tuberose blossoms, and an immense quantity of other material.

Miss Anthony says; "I have been roundly abused and ridiculed for allowing a female clerk of mine to send a letter in which woman suffrage was spelt 'sufferage,' and was not corrected. There is a little secret history about that letter that will be amusing to those who cannot spell suffrage. The fact is that my clerk made a correct copy of the letter, which I approved, and which was then sent to a male clerk, a college graduate, to make a large number of copies. Every copy which this gentleman prepared read 'sufferage,' and what is still more startling, a number of members of congress in replying to the letter, adopted the same unique orthography."

Sunlight and Human Health.

From the London Observer.

For some considerable time past the Astronomer Royal and his assistants have been weekly reporting the significant fact that the recorded sunshine during the seven days has been, upon an average, nil. Prima facie it is only photographers who need be affected by this intelligence. What can it possibly matter to the world at large if there is not sunshine enough about to discolor a piece of sensitized paper? As a matter of fact, however, the discoloration of sensitized paper is but one of the many processes due to the chemical energy of the sunlight. And a prolonged absence of sunlight is a very serious matter. Its effects upon the health are direct and perceptible. We get no ozone, and we become dull and listless, as if we had been sitting up all night. When thus out of tone and below par, we are consequently deficient in that vital energy which would otherwise enable us to shake off any ordinary ailment. Nor is this all. Absence of sunlight for any considerable period is almost invariably followed by epidemic outbreaks. When the sun is active, filth of all kinds putrifies as it collects. When there is no sunshine the filth collects, accumulates in masses, and ferments. These fermented accumulations are a source of positive danger as soon as the sun resumes its activity. Decomposition under a bright sun is comparatively harmless. Slow decomposition in the dark is especially hostile to health. We need no chemist to tell us all this; but, at the same time, it is as well to bear the chemistry of common life in mind. When the astronomer Royal reports a total absence of sunshine we ought to be especially careful, and, it may be added, children suffer more from the absence of the sun's rays than do adults. Adults have only to keep alive; children have to keep alive and to grow, which entails a double amount of chemical work. Now, if there be no sunshine, we can best supplement its absence by exercise. And yet, strange enough, the absence of sunshine is regarded by most mothers as a sufficient ground for keeping children within doors. It is, on the contrary, the very reason why they should be sent out and kept out as much as possible.

Worth a Licking.

Editor's Drawer in Harper's for March.

Some years ago, in Georgia, that band of Christians knows as Ascensionists were having a grand revival. One day, when the meeting was in full force, a storm came up, and a young gentleman who was out hunting with his servant took refuge in the church door. Being curious to see the service, the two hunters crept up into the gallery, and there hid in a place where they could observe without being observed.

"Come, Lord, come, our robes are ready. Come, Lord, come," cried the preacher, while all present gave a loud "Amen."

"Marsa Gabe," whispered Cuffy, lifting his hunting horn to his mouth, "let me gib dem jist one toot."

"Put that horn down or I'll break your head," replied the master, in a whisper.

The horn dropped by Cuffy's side, and again the minister cried "Come Lord, come; we are all ready for thy coming. Come, Lord, come."

"Do, Marsa Gabe—do jist lemme gib 'em jist one little toot," pleaded Cuffy, wetting his lips and raising the horn.

"If you don't drop that horn, Cuffy, I'll whip you within an inch of your life," whispered the exasperated master.

"Blow, Gabriel, blow; we are ready for his coming. Blow, Gabriel, blow," pleaded the minister.

Cuffy could no longer resist the temptation, and sent a wild peal, ringing from end to end of the church; but long before its last echo died away his master and himself were the only occupants of the building.

"I's ready, for de licking, Marsa Gabe," and Cuffy, showing every tooth in his head, "for I clare to gracious its wuf two lickings to see de way common farm cattle kin git ober de ground wid skeered 'Scensionists behind 'em."

NOTES FOR THE FARM AND HOUSE.

Farming Notes and Suggestions.

Top-dressing at this season, with anything but the very finest and best manure, except on sod for corn, is a waste of time and labor. The effect comes too late to benefit the crop. Some active commercial fertilizer should be used instead.

Reserve enough of the most thoroughly decomposed and fine manure for top dressing the lawn. In the absence of this, apply ashes, nitrate of soda or some other fertilizer.

Less grain and more grazing tend to a better development of frame and muscle than when corn is fed to hogs exclusively. Build the frame first, and lay on the fat afterward.

English gardeners pay from $15 to $20 per hundred for toads and frogs to keep in the garden as insect destroyers.

In Indiana when a man has a sheep killed by a dog he must report the loss to the township trustees within ten days, and any person making a false statement of the amount of damage done may be fined $100 and imprisoned in the county jail thirty days. An assessor who fails to list any dog is liable to a fine of $5 for each case, and any one making a false statement of the number of dogs may be fined $100. A dog caught killing sheep may be killed without ceremony.

The Rural New Yorker describes an easy manner of relieving choking cattle. It is to with thumb and forefinger squeeze the side of the gullet together below the obstruction until the latter is forced up to the jaws. Then a quick upward thrust should be given or the animal should be choked until it shows signs of distress, when the hand should be quickly removed from the throat, and in nine times out of ten the obstruction will be thrown entirely out of the animal's mouth.

Prof. Thomas Taylor, microscopist in the department of agriculture, read an essay before the District Horticultural society lately upon "Insecticide in relation to horticulture." The essay abounded in information in reference to the destruction of the grape-vine by the phylloxera, as well as many other insects destructive to plant life. The professor stated that in experiments made by him he had found that naphthaline was one of the best insecticides yet discovered, and gave a very extended account of many experiments made by its use upon insects, and that if the naphline was pure, no injury would occur to the plants, but if impure, it would be injurious to plant life.

The winter radish is rarely found in farmers' gardens, though it is considered a treat to all who are fond of this vegetable at this time of the year. Try it in the garden the coming season. The seed need not be sown until the time for turnips. Thinned and well cultivated they will grow from ten to twelve inches long and three inches in diameter, when they are gathered bury them in sand in the cellar. Before using, place them for an hour in cold water. They will not grow well during the hot season and nothing is gained by haste in planting. The white California is much spoken of.

The history of the potato is quite modern, and gives rise to the question: How did our great grandsires do without the esculent? It is originally a South American plant, and was introduced into Virginia in 1629, but not generally known in England until a century or more later. In Pennsylvania potatoes became popular about 1685, the followers of Penn being good livers, but the New Yorkers were slower in introducing them. In 1775, as we are told, 17,000 bushels were grown on a sixteen-acre patch in New York—rather a large potato story, even for virgin soil. They were deemed an exotic rarity at a Harvard University dinner in 1707, and not brought into culture in New England till 1718. In Connecticut it was held that if a man ate potatoes every day the habit would kill him in seven years—just as some of our Southern farmers now contend that if the soil is plowed more than three inches deep it will ruin the ground, "and it won't fetch anything." The world moves.—Commercial Gazette.

Useful Home Information.

If a little kerosene is mixed with stove polish, it will assist greatly in improving the look of rusty stoves.

A fastidious convalescent may be deluded into taking more nourishment than he knows of, or is willing to take, by having a yelk of an egg stirred into his morning cup of coffee. Beat the egg very light.

If baby is hoarse at night, take a small piece of oil silk, rub a little lard or animal oil of any kind over it and fasten it next his skin, over the chest. It may be pinned with small safety pins to his wrapper.

Sponges which are to be used in the bath room may be softened by boiling for a few minutes in three waters. After each time of boiling rinse it in cold water, and put on the stove again in a pan of cold water.

To purify the air of the cellar, and to destroy parasitical growth, a German authority says: Put some roll primstone into a pan, set fire to it, close the doors and windows as tight as possible for two or three hours; repeat this inexpensive operation every three months.

A pretty cover for the table in your bedroom is made by using one of the large lace tidies or pillow covers that may be bought for a very small sum. It will be improved by lining. It costs less than a nice towel and will keep clean longer, as the dust may be shaken from it.

An Egg-Keeping Test.

At the Birmingham Poultry Show, England, prizes were offered for the best preserved eggs that had been kept two months. The eggs were tested by breaking one of each set competing for the prize into a clean saucer, also by boiling one of each lot.

The eggs that had been preserved in lime water, it was found on breaking them, presented cloudy whites. Eggs preserved by rubbing over with bees-wax and oil showed thin watery whites.

Eggs that stood best the test of boiling and which gained the first prize had been simply packed in common salt. These had lost little if any by evaporation, had good, consistent albumen and were pleasant to the taste. The exhibit which took the second prize was served as follows: Melt one part of white wax to two parts of spermaceti, boil and mix thoroughly; or, two parts clerified suet to one of wax and two of spermaceti. Take new laid eggs, rub with antiseptic salt or fine rice starch. Wrap each egg in fine tissue paper; putting the broad end downward; screw the paper tightly at the top, leaving an inch to hold it by. Dip each egg rapidly into the fat heated to 100 degrees. Withdraw and leave to cool. Pack broad end downward in dry, white sand or saw dust. The judges were inclined to believe that had the trial been for a longer period than two months, this latter method would, perhaps, have proven the better of the two. The eggs were excellent, and on stripping off the waxed paper the shells presented the clean, fresh appearance of newly laid eggs.

New Variety of Celery.

Celery growers will hail as "a great boon," a new variety of celery which blanches itself naturally and without any hilling up. It is a sport of the common kink which comes always true from the seed. This may be an instance of the evolution of a new variety of a plant, from education or training, so to speak. For celery growers have been laboriously earthing up their celery for years for the purpose of blanching it and fitting it for market. And here comes a new kind of its own accord which grows whiter than the artificially blanched. It has been the very appropriate name of the "White Plume," from its whiteness and from the feathery character of its primate handsomely cut leaves. It is exceedingly ornamental on the table, and so much so that it has been used for making bouquets. The flavor is much finer than the common celery, and it is remarkably crisp and tender. Its tenderness prevents its long keeping, but it is now in good condition excepting some of the outer stalks.—Marion, S.C., Cotton Plant.

To Keep a Horse From Jumping.

Not long since I saw a method of restraining horses from jumping, and was assured by those who were using it that it proved efficacious. It consists of a surcingle about the body of the horse, together with two short straps that pass through the surcingle and around each foreleg, being buckled so that when the horse stands upright the strap will fall about half-way to the knees. This arrangement, which allows the horse to walk quite freely, prevents its running as well as jumping. A similar plan is to connect the forelegs of a horse by straps secured just above the knees, but those who have tried both plans prefer the one herewith illustrated. Some horses are difficult to catch when at pasture, and this device will prove valuable in such cases.—Corr. American Agriculturist.

Why Women Should go to Church.

If the mother or head of the house is a wise woman, she will begin now to put the everyday summer clothing in order. The stockings and underwear should all be looked over and be put in wearing condition; then a little later the common dresses may be made or be made over, and so the hurry and worry that unfortunately often attends the coming of spring may to some extent be avoided. An honest woman confessed not long ago that although the minister of the church she attends, of which she is a member in excellent standing, is not at all liked as a preacher by his congregation, she finds that he is doing her a good deal of good. "I always listen to the text and the opening of the sermon," she said, "and after that his voice is so pleasant, and I am so sure that I know what he is going to say that I sit there in that quiet and restful place, and plan out my work for the week, and I notice that when I do this I always get along so much better during the week, for that Sunday morning hour is about the only one that I have during the week which is entirely free from demands upon me."

Too Much for Girls' Brains.

From the Popular Science Monthly.

Think of an undeveloped brain getting up book knowledge on ten different subjects all the same day, and this going on day after day for several years! It is altogether contrary to the principles of a sound psychology to imagine that any sort of mental process, worthy of the name of brain thinking, can take place in that brain while this is going on. The natural tendency of a good brain at that age to be inquisitive and receptive is glutted to more than satiety. The natural process of building up a fabric of mental completeness by having each new fact and observation looked at in different ways and having it suggest other facts and ideas, and then settle down as a part of the regular furniture of the mind, cannot possibly go on where new facts are shoveled in by the hundred day by day. The effect of this is bad on boys, but is worse on girls, because it is more alien to their mental constitution.

AN ACTOR'S FOND KISSES.

A Theatrical Husband's Indignation Freely Denounced.

New York Journal.

Hoboken's recent kissing affary has had a singularly sensational effect upon the dramatic profession in this city. The most recent reports from the scene of action represent Mlle. Blondle, the accomplished actress to a state of hopeful convalescence. Mlle. Blondle is the wife of Herr Hugo Blondle, a gentleman who derives supreme satisfaction from her thrilling impersonations of Lady Macbeth and other tragic characters.

At a recent performance in the Hoboken theater Mlle Blondle was cast as the heroine in a love comedy, and as such was obliged to submit to the rapturous overtures of Herr. Emil Grofe, a yellow-hued tragedian with wild eyes and yellow hair. In the scene where Mlle. Blondle wanders through a lonely wood at midnight, searching for her lover with a dark lantern, and finds him tied to a tree, Herr Grofe became excited. It was the scene which was to determine whether he should receive his salary after the curtain went down, and resolved to make a hit or die. Seizing Mlle. Blondle in his willowy arms he kissed her with such fervor that she screamed. There upon her husband climbed the stage and played with the actor for four rounds, greatly to the delight of the spectators.

Pending the disposition of the matter by the New Jersey courts, the actors in this city have become considerably worked up, and it is not unlikely that some action will be taken with reference to securing the conviction of the audacious husband.

"This subject of stage-kissing," said Mr. James Collier, when questioned by a Journal reporter, "is one of which actors are only competent to judge. There are occasions when the character of the scene demands a great deal of it, and if it were not done people would go away discontented and say they had been robbed."

"Do the actors enjoy it?" asked the reporter.

"Well" replied Mr. Collier, coloring deeply; "I can't say that I ever questioned them upon the subject. Speaking for myself, however, I am not ashamed to say that I always took my medicine without complaining."

"Have actresses ever complained to their husbands that you kissed them too much?"

"I should say not! Of course I never went to extremes in the matter, and can form no idea of what the consequences might have been if I had; but I will say this much, I never yet heard of any grumbling in so far as I was concerned, save one, and, if I remember aright, it was because I underdid it."

"Isn't there a good deal of pretended kissing on the stage."

"Oh, yes. When an actor and actress are enemies for instance, and their parts require them to kiss, they generally lay their heads over each other's shoulders and smack their lips. It would be better, perhaps, if this were made the rule, but after all, you know, human nature is human nature, and actors are like other people."

"My dear boy—my dear boy—my dear, dear, dear, dear, boy!" exclaimed Mr. John Dorcas Mathews, "I know you won't believe me, but the truth is I know very little about the matter. I am generally cast as a villian or an old gentleman, you know, and I've enjoyed very little of the luxuries of the profession."

"Was it always thus?"

"Not always, thank heaven. There was a time——"

And Mr. Mathews gazed mentally into the past and sighed.

"Is kissing, then, one of the luxuries of the profession?"

"My dear boy," replied Mr. Mathews, "it's the only perquisite the poor devils have. Business is no longer what it was, and if the boys and girls could no longer kiss each other—in a friendly way, you know; nothing but friendship, my boy; pure, unadulterated friendship—Lord help them! I don't know what they would do."

"What is the general feeling with respect to the Hoboken assault?"

"Sympathetic, sir, purely sympathetic. Husbands who are not actors should not be allowed on the stage. They are no good, sir, no good; positively and emphatically, n. g. Why, sir, if I had a part, and was called upon to kiss a pretty girl, sir, I would——

Mr. Mathews sighed again and then began a long story about a man in Kalamazoo who tried to kiss a balky horse and had his nose bit off.

"I have given the matter no consideration," said Mr. Henry Bergh. "It is not a subject in which I am interested."

THE GIRL OF THE TIME.

A

The Things She is Taught—Her Enslavement for Fashion's Foibles.

Nancy Willard Covell, before Massachusetts Suffrage Association.

All that girls are taught is to be pretty, and hide their faults, and read love stories, and crochet, and make sponge cake, until some one asks them to marry. So the poor creatures, through fear that they will miss their chances and fail to marry, begin very early to pinch themselves in some places and pad themselves in others. Sometimes they wear clothing enough to founder a ship, and again it is pronounced "lovely" to appear without any to speak of. With the injunction ringing in their ears, "Whatever you do be pretty," girls paint their lips and crock their eyebrows, and take opium to make their eyes soft, and arsenic to make their complexions clear. It was an unfortunate day when Paul or somebody else said the joy of woman was her hair. What nameless and untold tortures has this appendage to the human body not been subjected to? It has been filled with "rats" and "mice," heroically pulled out by the roots to make the forehead high, glued to the forehead with extract of quince seed, and again brought over the eyes in tangled snares. It has been curled with over-hot irons, and then allowed to float free far down the back; it has been puffed, and frizzled, and powdered, and curled, and greased and banged—done up high or low, made longer or shorter, or died black or blonde—in strict accordance with the caprice of the fickle goddess of fashion. Does the Grecian bend require them to look like a dejected monkey, straightway they become limp in body, and chatter that they do not do it because it is fashion—it is perfectly natural to them. To-day they drag innumerable yards of dry goods through the street and to-morrow they appear in tie-backs so close that it is at the risk of their lives that they attempt to board a railroad train. Now the head is surmounted by a bonnet the size of a postage stamp, and then one larger than an umbrella. Sometimes women are supposed to have hips, and then everybody, no matter how slender, grows broader than a donkey with panniers. Then hips are abolished and no trace of them can be discovered. If snakes and bugs become fashionable as ornaments, then snakes and bugs become "perfectly lovely," and the very girl who shrieks at the sight of a spider, simpers, "they are just too lovely for anything." When iridescent beads become fashionable, one has only to wait a little and every woman becomes a walking rainbow. Now cardinal is the rage, and then green; now mits, and then twelve-button gloves, now pleatings, and then ruffles, now hems, and then facing; now waists are long and the ribs are laced down until they adhere to the liver, and then the waist gets shorter, and an opportunity is given to breathe. In short, woman's enslavement by fashion has resolved her life for her into an eternal game of "wig-wag," and until she escapes this bondage there is no mental life for her. All this, the speaker contended, is the outgrowth of the oppression of man in not giving woman an opportunity to develop herself mentally, and in not giving her a social position equal with his own.

Farm Notes.

Dairy Dots.

Farmers' Tribune.

From quite a number of our exchanges in various portions of the State, we learn that the organization of farmer's clubs is being discussed with considerable freedom. These clubs can be made of great benefit to farmers if they will only interest themselves in them. From the Elgin Farmer's and Dairymen's Club, organized back in the sixties, grew the Northwestern Dairymen's Association, the Elgin Board of Trade, and all the dairy associations now in existence in the Northwest. All farmers cannot attend the larger meetings that are held, but if each county had a farmer's or dairymen's club, they could attend their local organization and be profited thereby. Cottonwood County now seems to be moving in the matter of organizing a farmer's and dairymen's club. Let the good work go on.

In his annual address at the Illinois Dairymen's Association, the President said: "No strictly gilt-edged butter has, or ever can be, made in factories or rooms where smoking of tobacco is allowed. Such smoke is absorbed to a greater or less extent by the milk, cream, or butter, and it is a fact beyond controversion, that such smokers have but a faint idea of the effects produced on the butter by the use of that noxious weed, as their sensibilities are so blunted that they are incapable of detecting its injurious effect on the butter." How many farmers are there who sit around the house smoking while the churning is going on, and wonder when they take the butter to the store that the merchant offers them less for it than their more cleanly neighbor received for his? If ever people needed instruction on any one point in regard to dairying, it is on cleanliness. Absolute cleanliness is necessary in the dairy, or deteriorated goods will be the result.

A writer in an exchange says: "The art of butter making will never reach perfection until we stop putting salt in the butter. It is a depraved taste that requires a salt taste in butter. The most critical judges in the old country never think of allowing salt to come near the butter, and after getting accustomed to it there is all the difference between the two that there is between salt and fresh fish, flesh or other dried or prepared food. The true epicure could eat a pound of unsalted butter at a sitting. It will be money in the dairyman's pocket when salt is abandoned in the dairy."

We can only say that we believe in salt, good salt, but not too much of it. It is the salt that preserves the butter and adds to its flavor. We have seen butter that was made without salt, and we are free to confess that a little of it went a good ways. It is true that in many of the markets of Europe the butter is sold fresh, but that does not argue that we want it. How would any one like meat or fish without the saline seasoning? And butter, being a oily compound, needs a little salt to make it palatable as well as to preserve it.

An exchange remarks. With butter down to sixteen cents, milk is a product produced at a loss. Allowing twelve quarts to a pound of butter, it would be one and a third cents to the quart—price less than the real value of feeding calves or pigs.

Butter milk is a matter of frequent occurrence every fall and winter, or soon after the cows are off from grazing. It is caused first by bitter herbs in the hay—such as may weed, Johnswort, etc., and also by the use of too much over-ripe food, such as straw, corn stover, or late cut hay. It never occurs when cows are fed on good food, and are thriving, or even holding their own, and are kept comfortably warm.

An anonymous writer very truly remarks that the dairyman, by the force of circumstances, has to become versed in the breeding and management of stock, especially that of dairy breeds; since in the very nature of things, he becomes a thoughtful, studious, observing man, and, what is better, he attains higher intelligence. The advantages of dairying call out among other things, enhanced revenues, because butter and cheese have become necessities; it enriches the farm, and is perfectly adapted to foster the breeding and raising of better and more stock. It embodies thrift, progress, and prosperity. Under "new methods" it makes fine butter and choice beef, not by any means less, but even more, and affords better grain. It does not imply farm houses with [illegible] burdens, but, on the contrary, relieved of drudgery, and the time gained can be spent in cultivating refining graces, and thus making farmers' homes abodes of culture, refinement, and education; placing the farmer upon a level financially, socially, and intellectually with any class or profession.

PROFITABLE INVESTMENT.

[illegible] Tribune: As is well known [illegible] farmers, experiments are not usually [illegible], and consequently they are [illegible] much encouraged among them. In [illegible] I came up into the Northwest and commenced farming. After a few years I thought it was costing farmers much to raise their pork, and upon [illegible] with a neighbor who had six [illegible] and plenty of old potatoes [illegible] and four yearling [illegible] in March, he assured me [illegible] only of corn on hand [illegible] of shoats about to bring pigs [illegible] afterwards my four had increased to twenty-seven. But nothing daunted, I went and paid $12 for twelve bushels of black-eyed peas, and sowed them at four different times at about ten days apart. The piece of ground used for them was surrounded by a rail fence. Then near I planted two acres of corn and one acre of potatoes. The pigs and their mothers were fed on waste milk and meal or meal pudding. Still the pigs were about eight weeks old when my first sown peas were fairly ready to cook, and then swinging the rail fence around I let the whole flock have about one-eighth of the piece of peas, giving them those first sown. The twenty-seven porkers went to work and they did work, both upon peas and vines, till there was scarcely a fragment left in sight. A happier set of living existences than they were I think I never saw. About once a week I had the fence set over, giving them each time as much as I thought they would consume without wasting any. When the peas were all gone the acre of potatoes was in fine condition for them, and I swung the fence around them and let the hogs have the whole lot. This changed their exercise from shelling peas to digging potatoes, which they seemed to enjoy greater. And for myself, I never felt the harvesting of peas and potatoes so little before. In fact it was choice fun to see twenty-seven hogs and pigs, each one on his own hook, dig and eat to the music of his own good natured grunt; nor did nor did I ever see porkers grow so fast befor.

Next came the two acres of corn which was now full in the milk, the ears of which I had picked off daily and throwing to them. They ate at first corn, cob and husk eagerly—but when it hardened they ate the corn only. This corn fed them till the 1st of December, when they were all dressed, except four store hogs, and they weighed 8000 pounds and sold for $400. My neighbor's four hogs weighed 2200 pounds.

My fifty bushels of corn—was worth	$ 20
The use of my land was worth	$ 40
The labor was worth	$ 40
Seed potatoes and corn was worth	$ 2
Seed peas cost	$ 12
Whole cost	$ 112

The twenty three sold brought $400, so the profit was $286.

A Minnesota Farmer.

AT HAND.

The time is at hand when the farmer must seriously think about spring's work. Present indications, it is true, do not warrant the belief that we shall have a very early spring, but no one can tell much what our future Minnesota weather will be. We have known wheat sowed in this state as early as the 22d of February, and then again we have seen February and March pass and April well advanced before any seed could be sowed. How it may be this year no one can fortell, but it is best to be ready for the seed time when it does come, and whether it be early or late, there is not much time to spare in getting ready. Let us see for a moment what has to be done.

Our teams must be put in good condition for the extra work expected of them during seeding. The harnesses must be whole, stout and strong, so that there will be no delay when work is so driving that, should they want mending, there will be no time. The seeders, plows and harrows must, or should, be all ready to commence operations at a moment's notice. Above all, the seed should be in the granary ready for use; supplies necessary for the household should be in the larder, and in sufficient quantities to last through the spring work. The wood-pile or the coal-shed, as the case may be, should be well supplied, too. When the spring work has to be done up in a hurry, as is likely to be the case in Minnesota this year, it can be pretty certainly estimated that there will not be much leisure on the hands of farmers to run here and there on errands. By having everything ready to start right in at the proper moment, a great deal of work can be accomplished in a short time.

FRUIT BUDS ALL RIGHT.

Although we have been visited by extreme cold weather this winter, we do not learn that the fruit buds on the apple trees in Minnesota have, up to this time, received the slightest injury from the frost, and it is to be hoped, now, that they will not receive any injury. It cannot be denied, however, that March is a pretty severe month in this climate, on fruit trees. There is plenty of time yet before spring comes, for them to be injured, but the prospects are favorable now for a good apple crop next year.

It seems a little remarkable that, cold as it has been, fruit trees have been wintered thus far with so little injury, and in such good condition. It is claimed by some of our best fruit growers that the terminal branches have received no injury from the frost king.

THOROUGH CULTIVATIONS.

Naturally the soil of Minnesota is very rich. There is no question about that. The same may be said in regard to the soil in all the Northwestern States and Territories. As in a moral point of view, it is useful to have seasons of reflection, reviewing the events of past and inferring their effects on the future, so in agriculture, it is useful to compare notes, to interchange [illegible] and [illegible] events, and [illegible] practices already realized to lay our plans, regulate our operations, and in all their results for the future. Now [illegible] done; that in farming, whatever crops are raised, should be good crops; that what ever animals are fed, should be well fed, and whatever is seeded should be fully seeded. Whether the cereal grains or grasses be sown, the ground should be fully occupied with the young plants. "He who sows sparingly shall reap sparingly, and he who sows bountifully shall reap bountifully," are declarations as true as they are ancient, and should be, especially in seed time, in every husbandman's mouth. Good land, such as abounds in the Northwest, in ordinary cultivation, is bound to be occupied, and if we do not occupy with good seed, nature will most assuredly occupy with weeds. There is surely something ennobling, morally elevating, in liberal, enlightened and successful farming. If a man would succeed in cultivating the soil, he must not be niggardly, but must lay out freely for labor, for good and durable implements, convenient and permanent fixtures, and good and plentiful agricultural reading. It is important, however, sedulously to guard against extravagance and waste, as well as penuriousness. The most scrupulous and exact economy should pervade every department, nothing neglected or suffered to run to waste, and a general appearance of order and harmony should give unity and beauty to the whole.

HOME HINTS FOR SPRING.

Bureau and washstand covers are among the most common pieces of fancy work, and are of countless designs. Among the prettiest, this winter, are those of crash or momie cloth, made in scarf pattern, with the ends in embroidery and drawn work, from a quarter to half a yard broad. They may be done with colored silk, but are much prettier when worked with the threads which have been taken from the material. The fringe, which is formed by drawing out threads, when the work is all done, has a broad heading made by alternately taken out and leaving seven or eight threads; and, over those left, working a cross-stitch or featherstitch. Above this are broad, open patterns of drawn-work, and ribbon may be drawn through, or a bright color placed under. There should be a pin cushion cover to match. Mantel and window lambrequins are made in the same way, or they may be crocheted with fisherman's twine to imitate the Macrame work, which is so much more difficult. Any pretty pattern of knitted or crocheted edging can be used, and a fringe added, or colored tassels of chenille on each point.

Table linen, in a full, good supply of which a good housekeeper takes pride, is varied and beautiful enough to satisfy any taste. There are table cloths and napkins suited to every occasion, and every course from soup to coffee and fruit, with appropriate designs in colored or white embroidery; but an initial or monogram, worked in white, with or without fringed sides, which can be washed without fear of losing color, seems most desirable. Damask cloths of red or grayish brown are pretty and economical for breakfast and tea. The latest imported styles for napkins are long and narrow, like towels. These napkins protect the dress very perfectly, and are to be welcomed for this reason.

The large stores in the cities bring out their ginghams, prints and muslins in early spring, and it is well to make up plain summer dresses now. Styles which are simplest and can be done up easily are chosen for such goods. Plain blouse waists, plaited or gathered into a belt, a plain overskirt looped high on the hips, with an underskirt tucked or trimmed with gathered flounces, always laundry well.—For children a blouse waist, and skirt of two or three scant ruffles, with a broad sash of the material tied behind, is very pretty.

It is best to make up under clothing early, if done at home. If one wishes a combination of corset cover, skirt and chemise, which is popular and desirable, a close-fitting polonaise pattern, with the back seams cut off to an ordinary basque length, and two plain breadths gathered on and sewed into the long front side seams, will make a garment quite as satisfactory as those which cost two dollars and a half.—Ethel Stone, in American Agriculturist for March.

THE IMPERIAL TREE BEAN.

And the Minneapolis Farmers' Tribune.

To every person sending the name of a new yearly subscriber (it may be his own) for the Farmers' Tribune, a package of the seed of the remarkable Imperial Tree Bean with a choice selection of other garden seeds of the full list value of $1.00 will be sent free. The subscription price is only $1.15.

The Minneapolis Farmers' Tribune has taken a high rank among weekly papers in this country. It has no equal in the Northwest as a general family newspaper. It is a clean, hightoned, fearless exponent of Republican principles. In this year of great political contests it will afford all the news. The veteran journalist, Col. John H. Stevens, is the agricultural editor; Col. R. P. McGlincy, Secretary of the Northwestern Dairymen's Association is the editor of the Dairy Department, and Dr. E. A. A. Grange is editor of the Veterinary column. The Home Circle, with the distinguished Miss Juliet Corson as special editor, is invaluable, while Our Young Folks' Columns are bright with attractive pure and instructive literature and stories. must seek a shorter outlet to the seaboard and to European markets. The Hudson's Bay would furnish such an outlet, and everything pointed to it as being the natural outlet of the Red River Valley and the great Northwest.

Mr. C. S. Douglas in seconding the resolution said that the truth of the statement that Hudson Bay is the natural outlet for the products of the Red River Valley was so patent to all, especially after the valuable and interesting information which had been given them that evening that he would not occupy their time, particularly as it was late, with any extended remarks in support of the resolution. The fact that all the great rivers of the Northwest drained into Hudson's Bay and furnished a system of inland navigation thousands of miles in extent, warranted the belief that an all-wise Creator had intended it to be utilized by man. He read a statement of distances which he had prepared for presentation to the Fargo Chamber of Commerce while on his recent visit there, remarking that those present could adapt it locally by remembering that Fargo is 150 miles south of Emerson. Fargo to New York 1600 miles; New York to Liverpool 3000 miles; total 4,600 miles. Fargo to Port Churchill 925 miles; Port Churchill to Liverpool, 2,289 miles; total 3,205 miles. Difference in favor of Hudson's Bay route, 1,395 miles.

Cultivate Variety.

Moorhead News: In a conversation with a News reporter last night Prof. Whitney stated that if ever he sold his property in Michigan he would surely settle in Minnesota. He thinks the Red River Valley possesses immense richness, but is seriously inclined to believe that the farmers of the valley are abusing its fertility and keeping themselves poor by persistently clinging to the exclusive cultivation of wheat. The history, he says, of all sections where the farmers' time and attention were given exclusively to the cultivation of one crop, is not clothed with the evidences of a most brilliant success. True, he said, the farmers of the Red River Valley have an abundance of grievances; they are taxed high rates by the railroads and defrauded of their just rights in the grading of their wheat; but I fear that the redress of all these grievances will not make them a prosperous and happy people. What they want is a variety of crops instead of purchasing almost everything they eat, aside from their bread, and in some instances everything their horses eat, the farmer of this valley should, and must, before he can become a success take to producing his own corn, meat, butter, &c. It is the heighth of folly for the farmer of this valley to let the Minneapolis dairies supply him with butter, and it is worse than folly for him to buy his meat in eastern markets when there is so much rich pasture and hay land lying idle. When all of these commonest necessaries of life are produced right at home then, and not until then, will a bright prosperity dawn upon the Red River farmer.

Prof. Whitney is a man of wide experience, and his judgment is certainly worthy of consideration.

Peterson's Magazine for April is of sterling merit, even more so than usual. It opens with a charming steel-engraving, "The Little Gleaner." Then comes a double-sized, colored, steel fashion-plate; four patterns for D'Oyleys, embroidered, printed in colors; and quite half a hundred wood-engravings of fashions, designs for work-table, etc. The stories, as usual, are the best of their kind. They lead off with "The Utterly Utter Boston Browns," illustrated, that is full of racy wit. "Peterson," in short, gets better and better. The price is still only two dollars a year. To clubs it is astonishingly low, viz: four copies for six dollars and a half, with an extra copy to the person getting up the club. Or five copies for eight dollars, with both an extra copy and "Tired Out," a splendid steel-engraving, or "The Golden Gift," illustrated, for getting up the club. Specimens are sent, gratis, to persons wishing to get up clubs. It is not too late to subscribe for 1884. Address Chas. J. Peterson, 306 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

MORTGAGE SALE.

DEFAULT HAVING BEEN MADE IN THE payment of the sum of seven hundred and twenty-eight and forty-nine one hundredths dollars, ([illegible] 49-100,) which is claimed to be due at the date of this notice upon a certain mortgage duly executed and delivered by Carrie Dewey and Alvah Dewey her husband to E. D. Childs bearing date the 14th day of June A. D. 1882, and with a power of sale therein contained, duly recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds in and for the County of Polk, and State of Minnesota, on the 19th day of June A. D. 1882, at 2 o'clock p. m. in book "N" of mortgages, on page 60, to secure the payment of a certain promissory note for the sum of five hundred dollars payable September 14th, 1883 with interest at the rate of ten per cent. per annum until paid, and duly executed and delivered by said Carrie Dewey and Alvah Dewey her husband, and no action or proceeding having been instituted, at law or otherwise, to recover the debt secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof, or the interest thereof.

Now therefore, notice is hereby given, that by virtue of the power of sale contained in said mortgage, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the premises described in and conveyed by said mortgage, viz: Lots eight and nine (8 and 9) in block five (5) and the east half of lot twenty-two (22) in block two (2) (all situate in the village of Fisher) according to the original plat thereof on file in the office of the Register of Deeds in and for said Polk County, and State of Minnesota, with the hereditaments and appurtenances; which sale will be made by the sheriff of said Polk County, at the front door of the Court House, in the city of Crookston, in said County and State, on the 29th day of March A. D. 1884, at ten o'clock a. m. of that day, at public vendue, to the highest bidder for cash, to pay said debt and interest, and the taxes, if any, on said premises, and twenty-five dollars attorney's fees as stipulated in and by said mortgage in case of foreclosure, and the disbursements allowed by law; subject to redemption at any time within one year from the day of sale, as provided by law.

STATE OF MINNESOTA, County of Polk, } ss. District Court, Eleventh Judicial District.

Notice is hereby given that by virtue of an execution to me directed and delivered and now in my hands, issued out of the District Court of the Eleventh Judicial District, State of Minnesota, County of Polk, upon a judgment rendered in said Court in favor Between Ernest Buse, plaintiff, and Mary R. Bottineau, and John B. Bottineau, defendants, in favor of said Ernest Buse.

I have levied upon the following described lands situated in the County of Polk and State of Minnesota, to-wit: One undivided one-third (⅓) of lots eight (8) nine (9) ten (10) eleven (11) and twelve (12) of Section fifteen (15); also the northwest quarter of section twenty-two (22) and lots two (2) and eight (8) of Section fourteen (14) and lots three (3) four (4) five (5) six (6) and thirteen (13) in Section fifteen (15); also the southwest quarter of the southeast quarter and the north half of the southeast quarter of Section twenty-two, (22) and the northwest quarter of the southwest quarter of Section twenty-three, (23) all in township one hundred and fifty one (151) north, of range forty-four (44) west; and lots seven (7) eight (8) nine (9) ten (10) eleven (11) in Section twenty-six (26) Township one hundred and fifty-one (151) north, of range forty-five (45) west; also lots five (5) six (6) seven (7) eight (8) nine (9) ten (10) eleven (11) and twelve (12) in Section eighteen (18); also lots one (1) two (2) three (3) six (6) and twelve (12), and the southwest quarter of the northeast quarter, and lots eight (8) nine (9) ten (10) eleven (11), and the southwest quarter of the southwest quarter of Section eight (8); also lots three (3) four (4) five (5) six (6) seven (7) and eight (8) of Section four, (4) Township one hundred and fifty (150) north, of Range forty-five (45) west, containing in the whole of said tract fourteen hundred and forty (1,440) acres, more or less, according to the government survey.

And that I shall, on Wednesday, the ninth (9th) day of April, A. D 1884, at the hour of ten o'clock a. m. of said day, at the front door of the Court House in said County and State proceed to sell all the right, title and interest of the above named Mary R. Bottineau and John B. Bottineau in and to the above described property to satisfy said judgment and costs amounting to (nine hundred and fifty-three 93-100 dollars $953 93-100) together with all accruing costs of sale and interest on the same from January 2[illegible] 1884, at the rate of seven (7) per cent. per annum, at public auction to the highest bidder for cash.

STATE OF MINNESOTA, County of Polk, } ss. In Probate Court.

In the matter of the estate of Alexander Grant, deceased:

On reading and filing the petition of W. D. Raymond, of Polk County, Minnesota, representing among other things, that Alexander Grant, late of Polk County, Minnesota, on the 26th day of March 1881, at the city of Crookston, in said county, died intestate, and being a resident of this county at the time of his death, leaving goods, chattels and estate within this county, and that the said petitioner is a friend of said deceased, and praying that administration of said estate be to John B. McLaren, granted.

It is ordered that said petition be heard before the Judge of this Court, on Wednesday, the 26th day of March, 1884, at 10 o'clock a. m., at the Probate Office in Crookston, in said county.

Ordered further, that notice thereof be given to the heirs of said deceased, and to all persons interested, by publishing a copy of this order for three successive weeks prior to said day of hearing, in the POLK COUNTY JOURNAL, a weekly newspaper printed and published at the city of Crookston, in said county.

Dated at Crookston, the 12th day of February, 1884.

The Farmers' Meeting.

Pursuant to the published call the members of the Farmers' Alliance met at city hall at 2 o'clock p. m., for the purpose of electing six delegates to represent the Polk County Alliance in the convention at St. Paul on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday March 18th 19th and 20th. In the absence of the president the secretary called the meeting to order at 2:30 p. m., stating that owing to the absence of the president it would be in order to elect a president pro tem. Mr. C. C. Utzinger nominated Hon. H. Steenerson who was duly elected president pro tem. The president stated that the object of the meeting was to elect delegates to attend the convention at St. Paul. On motion it was resolved to send six delegates. On motion the following gentlemen were duly elected: Hon. H. Steenerson, chairman, Paul C. Sletten, H. E. Cooke, Hon. B. Sampson, C. C. Utzinger and R. Reynolds. There appearing no other business before the house the meeting adjourned sine die.

H. STEENERSON, Pres't. Pro Tem.

The Foston Mail Route.

Some inquiries having been made recently in relation to the above route the following letters, which explain the situation up to date have been handed us for publication:

CROOKSTON March 3d, 1884.

Hon. Knute Nelson, Washington,

DEAR SIR:—I think I have written you about this mail route before. What is wanted and needed by the people east of this place, IS A DIRECT MAIL ROUTE FROM CROOKSTON THROUGH MAPLE BAY AND WOODSIDE TO FOSTON TWICE A WEEK. If you have not already fixed this matter please do it for the benefit of many hundred settlers. Letters from settlers enclosed. Yours truly,

P. C. SLETTEN.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES U S.,
WASHINGTON, D. C., March 8, 1884.

Hon. Paul C. Sletten, Crookston.

DEAR SIR:—The post route referred to in enclosed letters was inserted in the post route bill which has passed the House and is now in the Senate. How soon it is likely to pass there I can't say. But a general law has just passed both Houses making all public highways post routes while used as such highway. Under this act petitions should be drawn up stating that certain mail service (1, 2, 6 or 8 times weekly) is desired between certain offices (specifying them) and that between such offices and on the route where the service is desired is a public highway used as such, and such other facts as are pertinent and important to show the necessity for the service. Such petition should be addressed to the second Assistant Post Master General, and when properly signed, etc., should be sent to the member of Congress, who will endorse it with his recommendation and file it. By taking this course mail service can be obtained without waiting as heretofore for an act making post route. To save me correspondence I wish you would cause this fact to be published in your papers. I intend to ask the Second Assistant Post Master General to prepare proper blank petitions under this act.

K. NELSON.

Where Gardening Pays.

The farmer can readily raise a large share of the garden vegetables in demand in places of moderate size. Let the farmer who would undertake to raise crops more profitable than the staple farm products, begin with those most easily produced, and gradually work his way to those which are most profitable. In a town where there are factories employing numbers of foreign workmen cabbages are always in demand, and the earlier they are, the better the price they will bring. Most farmers grow late cabbages; to raise early kinds, he must either sow the seed in the fall and keep the plants through the winter in a cold frame, or sow in early spring in a hot-bed and forward the plants to be ready to set out when the ground is in condition. Either method is out of the usual way of farming, but there is nothing about it that can not be readily learned. Onions are always in demand, if the bulbs are bunched and sold while two-thirds grown, and the crop is a very profitable one. Sweet corn is as readily raised as field corn, and after the ears are taken off, the stalks [illegible] fodder; these will pay the cost of cultivation, leaving what is received for the ears clear profit. Green peas and string beans are easily raised, and if pickers are at hand, will pay well, as will new potatoes, beets, etc. The crops here suggested, with exception of early cabbages, are as easily raised as ordinary farm crops. It will be well for those near a local market to make a trial of these at first, and gradually increase the list. Farm gardening offers a ready relief to those who find that "farming does not pay," and those who need to grow more profitable crops should look into its possibilities. The works of Henderson, Harris, Brill and Quinn, each give valuable aid to the cultivator. Success will, in part, depend upon locality, supply of manure, quality of seed, and the character of the market; but the probabilities are greatly in favor of a profitable return from a well conducted farm garden.—[American Agriculturist.

On the Road

David W. Judd continues in the American Agriculturist h's Notes of Western Travel.

CULTIVATING THE MEMORY.

One, while travelling, is constantly afforded single illustrations of memory training. A conductor only glances cursorily at the countenances of the passengers in perhaps a dozen car coaches as he passes through collecting tickets and fares. And yet so successfully does he carry these countenances in his memory, that a stranger is immediately recognized when appearing on the train. The dusky door-keeper at the entrance of a dining hall in a large first-class hotel takes your hat as you pass in for your meal, and deposits it on the rack. There may be several hundred others going and coming, and yet you are sure to receive the right hat as you file out. Seated at the same table there may be four or five others, and all of you give to the negro waiter combined orders for fifty, sixty or more dishes, enough to confuse the ordinary white man's brain. And yet the lowly black, who maybe was liberated by President Lincoln's proclamation, and scarcely now knows how to read, brings all the different articles of food as told. There is no confusion of orders. Every one of the guests at the table has placed before him the precise dishes he ordered. If by practice the untutored negro can acquire such remarkable proficiency in the art of memorizing, how readily many others strengthen what they choose to term a naturally poor memory.

"LOCATED" THE PRAIRIE "SHACK."

The traveller over the prairie will readily recognize the temporary home of the homesteader standing alone by itself. If timber is too scarce and too high, the new comer erects a sod house for the time being, particularly if he be a Swede or a Bohemian immigrant. As a general thing, however, he quickly throws together a few timbers, making a cover of boards with a protruding stove-pipe, and this constitutes his home until he is able to erect a more pretentious structure. He calls it his "shack."—In securing land under the homestead or preemption acts, one must establish a residence. All over the States and Territories, dishonest persons have at one time and another erected these "shacks" without any intention of occupying them, but simply to call them residences, and thus impose upon the Government. I have seen them in Wyoming and Colorado, constructed of simply four upright posts, with timbers stretched between them, having no sides or roof. The owners might be a hundred or five hundred miles away. The Government authorities are now, however, exercising so much vigilance, that it is much more difficult to practice impositions of this character, then it was years ago.

RAIL ROAD RIVALRY.

The great through railroad line in their vigorous efforts to cover as much Western territory as possible, have all of them unquestionably built "ahead of time," which fact accounts to some extent for the present depreciation in railroad securities. And yet this constant pushing to cover new territory is well nigh unavoidable on the part of many rail roads. If one does not possess the land some rival will, and thus secure control of the region. This rivalry leads to some amusing circumstances. Not long since two of the trunk lines opened negotiations for a local rail road running between their routes. Neither wanted the third, but neither wanted the other to acquire possession of it. One day the President and other officers of one of the roads chartered a special car and proceeded over the local line to make examination with a view to purchasing. No sooner had the officers of the other line learned of this fact than they immediately on that very forenoon closed with the offer which had been made them, acquired possession of the new line, and in the middle of the afternoon ordered back home the special car containing the President and other reconnoitering officers of the rival road. [illegible] prairies, the Eastern visitor is surprised at discovering that the horses are not shod. He turns to the driver to enquire why this has not been attended to, especially as they are to make such a long journey. He is informed, in reply, that the horses are not provided with shoes on the prairie. The shoes are not only unnecessary but the animals do much better without them.

KNOWING TO MUCH.

Many settlers from the older States do not take time in locating, or making purchases of land in the far West. They think they know all about the soil, and, often without stopping to avail themselves of the advice and experience of others, they quickly make purchases, to discover afterwards that they have perhaps bought poor land, or paid far too much for moderately good land. Take plenty of time and look about before you select your site for a home.

Farm Notes.

Poultry Raising as a Business.

There is just now much interest in poultry raising, and a disposition to take it up on a large scale. The following extract from one of our recent letters will give an idea of the many inquiries made of us: "Is poultry raising a profitable business, and would you advise a young man to invest one thousand dollars in it?"—This might be answered, in brief: Poultry are profitable, and we would not advise a young man (nor an old one) to at once invest one thousand dollars in it. Farmers find the poultry yard the most profitable part of the farm, in proportion to the capital invested. Many reckon in this way: If fifty fowls are profitable, five hundred will be ten times as profitable. This is an instance in which figures do not tell the truth. As soon as the number of fowls is doubled, troubles are quadrupled. A range and houses which will keep fifty in perfect health, will be overcrowded with one hundred, and all the troubles due to a dense population will follow. While we believe that poultry keeping on a large scale may be made profitable, capital to purchase birds and build houses, is not the only thing needful. Those who undertake the business, must give their whole time and attention to it. One point is well settled—fowls can not be kept together in large numbers, and thrive. The whole matter requires careful study and experiment. The beginner should start in a small way, and increase as success seems to warrant it. The point to be determined at the outset, is: Shall eggs or dressed fowls be the object? Each requires a different management throughout, though the two may, in a measure, be united. Starting with abundant capital, and no experience, will surely end in failure. The best works upon poultry management insist upon keeping fowls in small flocks; this is regarded essential to success.—P. H. Jacobs, in American Agriculturist.

Hints for Furnishing Farm Houses.

Many farmers' wives and daughters have an instinctive sense of beauty in regard to the adornment of their homes, yet feel that their income is too limited to do anything. But if they look around for what nature will freely supply, they will be surprised at the transformation which can be easily wrought in rooms that before seemed dull and plain. Ferns gathered in summer, and leaves in autumn, pressed, and pinned on the wall in irregular sprays, beginning at the cornice, look very graceful. Let white tarleton, costing eighteen or twenty cents a yard, be cut in strips about half a yard wide and tacked over parlor and sitting room windows for lambrequins. On these pin some brilliant autumn leaves scattered here and there carelessly, with perhaps a border of ferns, and you will be astonish at the fairy-like appearance presented. I remember gathering great quantities of ferns while staying one summer at a New England rural home, and the satirical remark of the farmer, that "he wished he could turn all the Philadelphia ladies loose into his field and have them pull up all the 'brakes.'" But even this practical man was impressed by the arrangement above described.—E. Lynde, in American Agriculturist.

Draining Prolongs the Season.

A case showing the utility of draining recently occurred under our observation. A portion of the field underlaid with clay and hard pan, that kept the water near the surface, was drained in the fall of 1882. Crookneck squashes and other crops were planted in 1883 about the middle of May where the ground originally was so wet that it did not admit of planting until June. Several hills of squashes were planted at a distance from the drain, while chance seeds dropped in the manure came up within a few feet of another main drain. The first week in September came a cold snap which killed the squash vines in the first location, leaving a portion of the crop about half grown. This and the [illegible] were still vigorous when the squashes were gathered in October. The same influence in prolonging the season was noticed in the beet crop grown upon the undrained land in 1882 and the same crop grown in 1883. The soil was so wet and muddy in the previous season, that the beet seed rotted and had to be planted three times, and after that many gaps were filled with turnips. It was a very poor crop. In the past season the beet seed came up fairly, the few vacant places were filled by transplanting, and a fine crop of mangolds and sugar beets was gathered, at much less cost of labor. This is very conclusive proof of the advantage of draining. It raises the temperature of the soil so that seeds will vegetate two or three weeks earlier in the spring, and it retains the summer heat so that damaging frosts are kept off several weeks in the autumn. Draining is of special service in raising of all crops of tropical origin, as squashes, melons, tomatoes, egg plant, peppers, corn, etc. It is the effectual cure of wet land in all climates, and indispensable to the profitable cultivation of all swamps and spongy land in the northern portions of our country. It will add from four to six weeks to the length of the growing season, for many of the crops grown in the market garden and upon the farm. Capital invested in tile draining is admitted to be among the safest and best investments the farmer can make.—Wm. Clift, in American Agriculturist.

The Changes i. Swine.

As in other industries, there appears to be a continuous changing of opinion, or, as it might be called, fashion, in swine production. Among these changes, as has been stated, is the one of color—from almost total white to almost total black. The explanation of this is, that the more practical farmers who raise swine most largely, have found, or at least believe they have, that the dark-haired hogs have a hardiness and vigor that enables them to withstand the blistering suns, the biting frosts, alluvial mud and other vicissitudes incident to their being reared on so many of the comparatively unimproved farms in the great Mississippi Basin. Another change is from raising those hogs that weighed a thousand pounds to such as are considered satisfactory if weighing a third of that. Still another is the desire, that for two or three years has been gaining possession of a large number of good men, to raise one of the different sorts of "red" hogs. There are some really superior specimens among these, but a majority of them as bred and shown in the West are ungainly and lacking in finish. However, improvement is being made in the "red" hogs, and it is by no means impossible that they may afford a foundation for, or portion of, a combination that shall in the future be even superior as pork-makers and for breeding to anything the swine raisers at present possess.

A still further change, or rather advance, is the founding within a few years past of pedigree registers for swine. This was begun by the champions of the Berkshires in America (or more properly Illinois.) followed by three if not four, separate associations of Poland-China breeders, with as many different "Records," and just now by Berkshire breeders in England, and those in America who are believers in what they have officially designated as "Jersey Red, or Duroc" swine.

As a rule, these changes are in the direction of improvement, but in general quality such a high standard has now been attained that further improvement in that direction must, it would seem, be slow in the future as compared with the recent past, and those who accomplish it will need to have perseverance, patience, and skill.—F. D. Coburn, in American Agriculturist.

D. 1883, and, with a power of sale therein contained, duly recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds in and for the County of Polk and State of Minnesota, on the 19th day of June A. D. 1883, at 2 o'clock p. m., in book "N" of mortgages, on page 60, to secure the payment of a certain promissory note for the sum of five hundred dollars payable September 14th, 1883, with interest at the rate of ten per cent. per annum until paid, and duly executed and delivered by said Carrie Dewey and Alvah Dewey her husband, and no action or proceeding having been instituted, at law or otherwise, to recover the debt secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof, or the interest thereof.

Now therefore, notice is hereby given, that by virtue of the power of sale contained in said mortgage, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the premises described in and conveyed by said mortgage, viz: Lots eight and nine (8 and 9) in block five (5) and the east half of lot twenty-two (22) in block two (2) (all situate in the village of Fisher) according to the original plat thereof on file in the office of the Register of Deeds, in and for said Polk County, and State of Minnesota, with the hereditaments and appurtenances; which sale will be made by the sheriff of said Polk County, at the front door of the Court House, in the city of Crookston, in said County, and State, on the 29th day of March A. D. 1884, at ten o'clock a. m., of that day, at public vendue, to the highest bidder for cash, to pay said debt and interest, and the taxes, if any, on said premises, and twenty-five dollars attorney's fees as stipulated in and by said mortgage in case of foreclosure, and the disbursements allowed by law; subject to redemption at any time within one year from the day of sale, as provided by law.

Dated February 7th, A. D 1884.

E. D. CHILDS,
Mortgagee.

DAVIS BROWER,
Attorney for Mortgagee. [43-48]

STATE OF MINNESOTA, } ss. District Court,
County of Polk, } Eleventh Judicial District.

Notice is hereby given that by virtue of an execution to me directed and delivered and now in my hands, issued out of the District Court of the Eleventh Judicial District, State of Minnesota, County of Polk, upon a judgment rendered in said Court in favor Between Ernest Buse, plaintiff, and Mary E. Bottineau, and John B. Bottineau, defendants, in favor of said Ernest Buse.

I have levied upon the following described lands situated in the County of Polk and State of Minnesota, to-wit: One undivided one-third (⅓) of lots eight (8) nine (9) ten (10) eleven (11) and twelve (12) of Section fifteen (15); also the northwest quarter of Section twenty-two (22) and lots two (2) and eight (8) of Section fourteen (14) and lots three (3) four (4) five (5) six (6) and thirteen (13) in Section fifteen (15); also the southwest quarter of the southeast quarter and the north half of the southeast quarter of Section twenty-two, (22) and the northwest quarter of the southwest quarter of Section twenty-three, (23) all in township one hundred and fifty-one (151) north, of range forty-four (44) west; and lots seven (7) eight (8) nine (9) ten (10) eleven (11) in Section twenty-six (26) Township one hundred and fifty-one (151) north, of range forty-five (45) west; also lots five (5) six (6) seven (7) eight (8) nine (9) ten (10) eleven (11) and twelve (12) in Section eighteen (18); also lots one (1) two (2) three (3) six (6) and twelve (12), and the south west quarter of the northeast quarter, and lots eight (8) nine (9) ten (10) eleven (11), and the southwest quarter of the southwest quarter of Section eight (8); also lots three (3) four (4) five (5) six (6) seven (7) and eight (8) of Section four, (4) Township one hundred and fifty (150) north, of Range forty-five (45) west, containing in the whole of said tract fourteen hundred and forty (1,440) acres, more or less, according to the government survey.

And that I shall, on Wednesday, the ninth (9th) day of April, A. D 1884, at the hour of ten o'clock a. m. of said day, at the front door of the Court House in said County and State proceed to sell all the right, title and interest of the above named Mary E. Bottineau and John B. Bottineau in and to the above described property to satisfy said judgment and costs amounting to (nine hundred and fifty-three 26-100 dollars $953 26-100) together with all accruing costs of sale and interest on the same from January 26th, 1884, at the rate fo seven (7) per cent. per annum, at public auction to the highest bidder for cash.

W. F. ZWICKEY,
Sheriff of Polk County.

E. B. Chambers of the Fargo Republican made us a pleasant call Wednesday.

K. O. Yigstad, of St. Hilaire, gave us a pleasant call on Wednesday. Call again.

A bursted pipe of the water main caused a little trouble last week. It was between the switch and the main line on the railroad track.

Our streets were crouded with teams Wednesday, quite a good deal of wheat was brought in which was pretty well distributed among the different buyers.

The oyster supper, served by the young folks at the Land Office Hall, on Friday evening, was well attended and a success both socially and financially.

A. E. Ames, he of the Mountain Echo, gave our sanctum a welcome visit last week. Ames has evidently a Bonanza up there, judging by the number of legal ads his columns display.

Chas. Seely has received the sad news that Mrs. Randall Potter, a relative of his wife is very low with a fever. Mrs. Potter is a very old woman, being aged 80, and thus the hopes of her recovery are small.

Mr. B. O. Lindberg, of Edna, last week set an example that is worthy of emulation, by paying up for the JOURNAL before his subscription had expired. Oh, that there were thousands of the same kind!

It is our dearest wish to start in our new year (which commences May 1st.) with a new dress, and we trust those who are in arrears on a subscription will aid us in our laudable purpose.

Being duly elected to go to St. Paul to attend the farmers' State convention at that city we leave Mr. Henry Lewis in charge of our local department. Henry is a rattling good fellow and we expect our patrons will be well supplied with local items for once, at least.

Mr. Ole L. Haniary and his crew returned from surveying Tp. 149, R. 39, on Friday evening last and reports having a very severe trip. They were obliged to camp out during the most of the time which did not add very materially to their comfort. Mr. H. reports considerable pine in that township.

The Sheriff's auction sale of stock of Schraeder's barn, on Saturday last, was well attended and the stock sold at very good figures, considering the times and terms (which were strictly cash.) We are told that the oats sold were full of mustard seed and if such be the case they should not be allowed to be sold.

Mr. C. J. Kops, of this city is now prepared to sell organs at the very lowest price. He is agent for the Kimbal Organs, which are as good as there are in the market. Mr. Kops has had a good deal of experience in this business and knows what a good instrument is, and it would be well to see him before making a purchase. Look out for his ad next week.

A visit at the Commercial hotel last Saturday found that hostelry doing a good business and able to do a good deal of it. In addition to the sleeping rooms in the main building those in the brick block give accommodations for 80 or 40, which adds greatly to the capacity of the hotel. Mine host Topping evidently knows how to keep a hotel as it should be kept.

S. P. Norton takes pleasure in announcing to the public generally that he has rented the Lake View Hotel, which he has refurnished and fitted up in elegant style for the comfort and convenience of his guests; the rooms being large and pleasant with good ventilation. He asks for a share of the patronage of the generous public, and will leave nothing undone that can be done to make their stay with him pleasant. Board by the day or week. Give him a call.

Mine host Norton opened out the old Lake View Hotel on Saturday evening last in fine shape by giving a grand supper which was heartily enjoyed by the youth and beauty of our young city, and while we are about it, we might say that by the way some of the older citizens gobbled down the oysters, we should judge that they also enjoyed the occasion hugely. Judging by the first meal we should say that Mr. Norton knows quite well how to keep a hotel, and we trust he will receive the success he deserves.

We were favored with an invitation to attend commencement exercises of the law department of the University of Michigan, to occur at Ann Arbor, on the 24th and 26th of this month. Our thanks for the invitation are due to the courtesy of Fred Reynolds who graduates this year. We hope that Fred will conclude to settle down in Crookston and practice his profession, if so he will find many warm friends to welcome him to our city. Our hearty congratulations are extended to him on the occasion of his graduation.

DIED.

BOX—On Tuesday, March 18th, 1884, BIRDIE JAUNEATA Box, aged sixteen years, three months and fifteen days, daughter of Wm and Lizzie Box.

Attacked with that cruel disease, diphtheria, only two short days sufficed to lay the beautiful form in the grave. The sudden death has sent a thrill of intense pain throughout the whole city, especially touching the hearts of our young people, whose loyal ranks are for the first time invaded, and into whose exclusively happy circle, DEATH is the first stranger who has ever been admitted. But his presence, though unwelcome, is not to be banished, and seeking a shining mark, he passed swiftly and silently into our lost one's chamber and two angels came forth where but one went in. The brightest parental hopes were "borne upon her bier," the fondest anticipations buried with her. The vacant seat by the fireside and in the school room are constant reminders, that now to all earthly beings she is but a sweet memory, whose reality has fled into the "Silent Land." In agony we stretch forth our hands towards the Infinite, and only grasp the "memory," for the lovely spirit is content, and answers not to our call.

Then, Love, sleep on,
How can we wish thee to return to earth
To share its grief and lightsome mirth,
Now heaven is won?

Thou wert so fair
With thy white hands soft folded o'er thy breast
The delicate flowers to thy still heart pressed,
Thy crown of hair

Thy gentle eye—
Which ever beamed so bright was closed for aye,
And the dark lashes on thy pale cheek lay
So quietly—

It seemed that sleep
Bound thee for awhile in stillest spell,
—For a moment we would think it "well,"
And cease to weep.

Just gone before—
And we, as best we may, will travel on
To reach the brighter land, thy feet have won
To part no more.

Geo. F. Whitcomb, collecting agent for the St. Paul harvester works, gave us a pleasant call on Thursday morning. George is as lively as ever. The question now is "where's Tom Sprague?"

Mr. M. N. Malmberg gladdened our heart on Monday by bringing in a good square cord of dry oak wood and bidding us extend his subscription the money's worth. We should be very glad to see several of our friends upon the same terms.

Sealskin Jim tried to trade his team off for a pair of snow shoes yesterday, but the other party found some fault with Jim's sleigh, so the bargain was not closed. But anybody having a good pair of snow shoes had better interview Jim.

Railroad business seems to be growing better all the time, and the road is so well cleaned of snow that as many cars can be hauled by a locomotive now as there could be at any time during the year. Several car loads of stock passed here Wednesday, going north.

Our sidewalks present a good deal better appearance since the last two or three warm days, and Marshal McDonald is taking up crossings and making every provision for draining the streets for the coming thaw and spring runs. That is correct, Dan.

Fisher Bulletin: Hon. Marcus Johnson has returned from his trip to Lake Superior, where he has been looking after his silver mine which he has, in company with others, recently purchased. A party that saw him states that he had his pockets full of silver specimens.

Mr. George Bunzy was in from Maple Lake on Monday, greeting his many friends and setting up the cigars on the happy event. Said event transpired January 1st, but as this was the first time his friends had seen him and as the cigars were good ones his friends were ready to forgive him.

We are receiving our spring stock of lumber, and can fill any sized order, with good dry lumber. Large stock of sash and doors, building paper, &c.

We are informed as we go to press that the roller skating rink has closed for this season. This place will be sadly missed as it has been a great attraction ever since it was started and people have enjoyed the sport very much. We are in hopes that it may be opened again next season.

A meeting of veterans is to be held this afternoon in G. W. Lewis' office for the purpose of organizing a post of the Grand Army of the Republic in this city. The veterans here are expecting quite a large gathering, for all seem very much interested and think it will be a grand success.

It is a shame that people attending an entertainment of any kind have got to be so annoyed by those unruly boys in the rear of the Opera House. Some decisive step certainly ought to be taken in this matter immediately. It spoils the whole evening for any one going there to be entertained, and they make such a disturbance that they interrupt the people taking part very much. Make these boys behave themselves or let them be [illegible]

Several cars loaded with wagons, machinery and merchandise arrived from the south yesterday for this city.

Election day passed off quite pleasantly. Owing to the storm of the day before the total vote was not as large as usual. There was a little strife over some of the officers, but all ended harmoniously. The result of the election was as follows: Supervisors, Thos. Irwin, Elias Steenerson, A. M. Malmberg; Assessor, C. U. Webster; Justices, C. U. Webster, De. F. Bucklen; Clerk, C. U. Webster; Constables, L. Freeman, Geo. Roberts.

Owing to the increased volume of business at the court house, regular office hours have been established to effect on and after this date. The office hours will be from 8 a. m. to 12 m., and from 1 p. m., to 4 p. m. The adoption of this change enables the business of each office to be adjusted at the close of every business day.

The people on Broadway have (for the past two or three mornings) had their curiosity pretty well worked up to see a man of small stature pass along the street as far as the court house with a keg of nails under each arm and return the same way with the same identical load, in the meantime we heard the complaint, found the individual and requested the pleasure of an interview and upon asking him why were things thusly, he turned upon us with a look of either pity or disgust (we know not which) and remarked, that it was merely for exercise. Didn't you Charlie?

East Grand Forks Election.

Courier: The annual town meeting for the election of town officers in Grand Forks township was held yesterday. There were two tickets in the field, one the result of a caucus held on Saturday evening, and the other gotten up by a few self-constituted candidates whom we understand, with the exception of one gentleman, Mr. Jackson by name had a little spite to vent and were justly ruthlessly defeated. Let it be said to the credit of the town and country folks that the regular nominees were elected by handsome majorities. The following are the officers for the ensuing year; Supervisors, J. W. Howes, chairman, Robert Anderson, Ole H. Erickson; Treasurer, C. Madson; Town Clerk, F. J. Duffy; Assessor, Iver M. Johnson; Justices of the Peace Chas. Hollinger and Jas. C. Connor; Constable, C. L. Comings.

Led Astray.

The drama presented by the Crookston Dramatic Club last evening for the first time to the citizens of this city, was highly appreciated by quite a large audience, seldom if ever, have we seen in home companies such talent displayed. In the first place the drama is one which requires a great deal of study and attention in order to give it the required expression which we think is the great point gained, in the next place every one seemed to be in the right place and all acquited themselves very creditably and the JOURNAL heartily congratulates them upon their success. There will be a repetition of this drama this evening with the same cast.

SPECIAL NOTICE TO FARMERS.

We are prepared to announce to the farmers, and all who contemplate building, that we have reduced the price of lumber $2 per M., commencing March 19th. We have on hand two hundred thousand feet of good dry ship lap at $18 per M.; also a large stock of all kinds of dry lumber, lath, shingles, sash, doors, mouldings, pickets, building paper, &c., all at reduced figures. Call and be convinced for yourselves.

THE SECRET SERVICE.

Headquarters in Washington—Anecdotes and Curiosities.

Washington Cor. Boston Traveller.

On the floor of the treasury building are the headquarters of the Secret Service officers. I called there yesterday afternoon and had an interesting chat with Mr. Knight, a Massachusetts man, by the way, and one of the most capable and efficient officials in the service. He took me into a small room, around which were hung the trophies captured from counterfeiters. In one corner was an immense sectional "jimmy" used by burglars, and near by a small press used in the printing of bank and National notes. Said he: "The operations of the corps of Secret Service detectives extend all over the country.

"There is not a city or hamlet in the United States which is not liable to receive a visit from one or more of the forty men who are constantly on the watch to suppress the counterfeiting of the coin and paper money. The movements of our officers are of course, from the very nature and danger of the work they are engaged, kept in the strictest secrecy. They wear no badge, nor do they even carry a document showing that they are in any way connected with the service. Oftentimes months and months are taken in the detection of a single case, and when a man has once been convicted of counterfeiting, or of passing counterfeit money, he is never out of the reach of our eyes.

"To show how successful we have been in suppressing counterfeits, I can tell you that we have not seen a new issue of bad money for over two years and a half. In that safe which you see there, there are one million dollars in counterfeit paper money, and about $200,000 in bad coin. This sample book in which you see pasted bank and national notes, with the word bad punched out in each, contains $25,000, and we have here the histories and photogpaphs of 2,500 criminals, perhaps ten per cent. of which are women. William E. Brockway is the most notable person in the entire collection. He is called the 'King of Counterfeiters,' and occupies the first place in the album.

"Next to him are his two pals, Doyle, the man who passes the money, and Charles E. Smith, the most expert engraver of "crooked" work in the country. In all their operations Brockway furnished the money, laid out the plans and was the brains of the gang. Doyle passed the "staff," and Smith was the engraver. Doyle is now serving a twelve years' sentence in the Illinois state prison. Brockway was captured some eight weeks ago on the charge of counterfeiting some railroad bonds, samples of which we have here in this office. Smith engraved the famous plate from which the $1,000 seven-thirty bond of the issue of '65 was printed, and $83,000 worth of it was actually redeemed at the treasury department before it was discovered to be a counterfeit.

"The impression was so good that the experts were unable to determine wether the bonds were genuine or counterfeit, and the matter was only decided when the Goverment issue bearing the duplicate numbers came back for redemption. Smith also engraved what is known as the Hamilton fifty-dollar greenback, and the one hundred-dollar note on different banks, which are the finest known of these series. Several years ago a very shrewd dodge was played by one of Smith's confederates on R. A. White & Co., of Boston. A woman entered their store and looked at some very expensive shawls. Finally, she made up her mind to take one, and tendered a thousand-dollar bill in payment.

"The clerk took the money to the cashier, who sent it to the bank to find out whether it was genuine or not. The answer came that the bill was good beyond the shadow of a doubt. Then the clerk said that the shawl would be sent to the woman's address but she proceeded to get very angry, and said if they could not take her money without question that she would go elsewhere, and she flounced out of the store in a great rage. About an hour afterward she returned and told the clerk that she visit- other places, but that she had been able to find a shawl which suited her well as the one she had left in their ablishment. She said she would take with her, and tendered a one usand dollar bill in payment. The awl was valued at $200, and the man took it away with her, together h $800 in change. The bill first dered was genuine, the second was a nterfeit, and the firm was just a isand dollars out of pocket. Smith raved the plate from which this nterfeit note was printed, and it so nearly perfect that only a min- examination would have caused de- ion. Smith also engraved the plate n which the one thousand-dollar per cent. bonds were printed, but we tured the entire issue on Doyle in cago, amounting in all to two hun- d and four thousand dollars. A ous thing about his arrest by our ectives was the fact that they took suspecting that he had the old nterfeit one-hundred dollar bills in possession, when imagine their sur- they found a new bond. It will everal years before we shall have to after Mr. Doyle again. Next to h the best engraver of counterfeit y is Charles Ulrich, who served a of nine years in one of our North- risons. He is now in Germany. ge White is another expert of note. tands accredited with the best terfeit five-dollar bank note issued, ut few people are able to detect . The counterfeit is on the hants' National Bank New Bedford, Mass. re is a picture of George Albert , a noted counterfeiter who came England to this country and en- in his business. He was arrested, convicted and served nine years on, but he is now at liberty, and ed the government for $50,000 for mprisonment. His papers are in nds of British Minister West, but ldn't care to gamble that he will r anything. Now I wish to call ttention to two curious facts. nterfeiting runs in families, and hout exception the men engaged in re all poor. For instance, take the llard family. Thomas, Benjamin, rge and John, four brothers, all in clutches, together with an aunt. re is one brother out of jail, but [illegible] honest. Thomas Ballard is a wonderful [illegible]. He is the only person, so far [illegible] re satisfied, who has succeeded in imi- [illegible] the fibre paper upon which the [illegible] notes and bonds are printed. At present he is serving a thirty years' sentence as a reward for his discovery. He is a chemist of no ordinary attainments, and he invented a process by which he was able to take a genuine two or one-dollar bill and completely remove all traces of ink from its surface.

"Then with a counterfeit plate of a higher denomination, he would print upon the genuine paper, and thus raise the note. Speaking about raising notes, here is a check on the Third National Bank of New York, which was raised from $451 to $56,968, and paid, in 1876. The perpetrators worked off with chemicals all that was written in the check except the signature, and I regret to say that we have never been able to discover who did it. Here are three steel plates which were engraved by Ulrich for a five-dollar issue. The engraving is done on soft steel, and when completed the plate is hardened. To give you some idea of the amount of labor it takes to engrave these plates I can only say that we have evidence that Ulrich was fifteen months completing them. Perhaps the greatest curiosities in our entire collection are the bills which made their appearance about four years ago, executed with a pen entirely by hand. At first we thought that it must take a great amount of time for the rascal to turn out one of those bills, but now we think he produces about one a week. The denominations are fifties, twenties and tens, and they are turned into the Treasury for redemption from all parts of the Union. Sometimes our officers do a little work outside of the suppression of counterfeiting.

"We had a hand in the extermination of the famous Ku-Klux, and here is a suit captured from one of their members." Mr. Knight unrolled a package and brought to view a blood red hat of conical shape, on which was printed in black, "Mori! K. K. K." Then came a black mask, which covered the face and neck. The holes for eyes and mouth were colored red, and there were lamb's wool eyebrows and beard of white. A red shirt and black trousers, with a white strip along the outside seam, completed the attire, which was drawn on over the ordinary citizens' dress of the wearer. These are a few of the interesting things that can be seen by the visitor in the headquarters of the secret service.

A FREE RIDE.

The Device of an Ingenious Englishmen to Beat a Railway Company.

From the American Register.

A free journey by rail inside a carriage holding a "complimentary" in your waistcoat pocket may be, and doubtless is, a very pleasant thing. To travel free as Mr. George Adams, of Wolverhampton, England, did the other day, however, is scarcely to be recommended. Nor is it at all pleasant, as that gentleman will be ready at this moment to admit. Mr. Adams found himself in Liverpool sans six sous, and being of a sans souci disposition, determined to get home by a new and original method of "macing the rattler," as a cracksman would say, instead, of cheating the railroad company. His idea, to say the least of it, was ingenious, but he had reconed without his host. He procured two stout pieces of rope, which he fastened to the axles of the carriage, leaving a noose at the end of each. Into one noose he put his legs while he inserted his shoulders into the other. In this position he hung when the train started. The train was an express and did not stop until Crewe was reached, which is about seventy miles from Liverpool. He was rather uncomfortable when the train began to move, but when it got into full swing he had real torture and when he reached Crewe he was nearly dead with fright. Here he was taken into custody. To the Magistrate who adjudicted on the case he explained that his sensations when swaying to and fro were something awful and the effect of the sleepers as they rushed past him nearly robbed him of his reason and he "was afraid that every moment the rope would slip from his shoulders and hang him." The Magistrate decided very cutely that he had had enough punishment and remarking very sagely that he was not likely to repeat the experiment sent him about his business. An excursion on the stick of a Congreve rocket on the tail of a comet might be more exciting than this, but not much.

A WAR STORY.

A

How a Desperately Wounded Soldier Was Shot Dead at His Own Request by a Comrade.

Milwaukee Sentinel.

Henry J. Savage, of the Soldier's Home veterans, tells the following thrilling story of a war incident:

The oft-mooted question "Was ever a desperately wounded soldier shot dead, at his own earnest solicitation, by a comrade?" is answered in the affirmative by your humble servant. It happened as follows: The writer, a member of G. Company, First Delaware Infantry, was then attached to the Third Brigade (Weber's), Third Division (French's), Second Corps (Sumner's). After wading Antietam Creek, plunging through plowed fields, stubble-fields, his regiment was finally located within plain view of the enemy, when the welcome command ran along the line to "load and fire at will." It was then that our daily target-practice at Fortress Monroe came into excellent use, as many a poor devil of the Sixth Alabama learned to his cost. After firing eleven rounds the writer was wounded and ordered to the rear. While retreating in good order, but making most excellent time, his route led him through a portion of the Irish brigade. Here he saw a sight that capped the climax of horror. A member of that brigade was aimlessly stumbling around with both eyes shot out, begging some one, "for the love of God," to put an end to his misery. A Lieutenant of the Fourth New York was passing by, and seeing the poor fellow's condition and hearing his appeal, he haulted before him and asked if he really meant what he said.

"O yes, comrade," was the reply "I can not possibly live, and my agony is unendurable."

Without another word the officer drew his pistol, placed it to the victim's right ear, turned away his head, and pulled the trigger. A half wheel, a convulsive gasp, and one more unfortunate had passed over to the silent majority.

"It was better thus," said the Lieutenant, replacing his pistol and turning toward the writer, "for the poor fellow could—"

Just then a solid shot took the Lieutenant's head off, and the subsequent proceedings interested him no more.

POPE LEO'S CORONATION.

The Sixth Anniversary of the Event Celebrated with Great Pomp in the Sistine Chapel, Rome.

The 4th of March being the sixth anniversary of the coronation of Pope Leo XIV., the grand pontifical celebration in the Sistine chapel was unprecedently magnificent and impressive. His holiness, in grand robes and wearing the tiara, appeared resplendent in white and gold. He was carried in the coronation chair, supported on the shoulders of four servants, in light purple livery. Four other servants bore ancient fans of ostrich feathers. The pope looked feeble and aged. He entered the chapel with all papal pomp and ceremony. The procession along the majestic corridors and salons was headed by a group of the garde noble in semi-medieval costume; then came the papal procession proper; the cardinals first, two by two, their crimson trains being held by gentlemen pages, garbed in black velvet tunics with white lace cuffs; after the cardinals came the patriarchs, archbishops, bishops and monsignori in regular order two by two, and wearing their robes of purple; after these, deacons, doctors, priests, monks and friars of all degree and then the pope. Not an order of brotherhood type of the church's organization was without representation. After the church dignitaries came members of the diplomatic corps, their ladies and friends. After these came representatives of the Knights of Malta, grand master and three commanders of the order, they being lineal descendants of

THE FIRST VALIANTS KNOWN.

Following these were representatives of the Palistine and the Swiss guards, pontifical gendarmes and such members of foreign armies as received admission. In a tribune on the right and close to the entrance of the chapel were relatives and friends of the pope. In the tribune for sovereigns sat Prince Cresche and Gen. Caccia. A screen of rare tapestry fell in front of the lower part of Michael Angelo's painting of "The Last Judgment." Close by and on the left was the Papal throne. A group of cardinals sat in a semi-circle around it. The diplomatic corps accredited to the holy see sat in front rows of a tribune next to the permanent marble screen which divides the chancel of the chapel from the nave, and behind were benches occupied by ladies all robed in black and wearing black lace veils. Lay gentlemen wore evening dress without gloves. The approaches to these benches were controlled by the Camerieri Legreto di Spada Cappa, who are gentlemen representing by their birth and character all the countries of Christendom except America. The celebration of the mass was by the dean cardinal. The choir rendered mass music and Fanzzini's "Apparuit of Baini" and a benedictus especially composed. At the termination of the mass the pope, in clear monotone, intoned a "blessing," the entire congregation kneeling. As his holiness passed out and along the chambers he continually made the sign of the cross and blessed thd assemblage. After all this the pope held a long audience with Cardinal Jacobini.

Personal Paragraphs.

Vanderbilt homestead on Staten Island has been used for several years as a beer garden. W. H. Vanderbilt has just given notice to the tenant that the lease will not be renewed. It is said that on the site will be built a large charitable institute as a memorial to Commodore Vanderbilt.

An enterprising land agent who is rapidly building a city, on paper, offers to name one of the streets after Mr. Jones if he will take a corner lot at $20 and pay in advance. But the proposition is declined by the heavy weight of Binghamton, on the ground that "there is another man by the name of Jones."

Domino parties ar fashionable entertainments in New York, the ladies but not the gentlemen wearing masks. At one entertainment a young man was flirting desperately with a domino, when to his astonishment the voice behind the mask said: "Why, Bobby, where did you learn such frightful things?" The domino proved to be his mother.

A policeman recently arrested a man in Guadalajara, Mexico, for murder. The prisoner, instead of offering resistance, politely invited the officer to take a drink. The latter, who is like all other officers, did so, and immediately fell over dead. The wine had been poisoned.

Jefferson Davis has been invited by the Mississippi house of representatives to deliver an address before that body on the "Life and Character of Sargent S. Prentiss." Mr. Davis, in reply, says that his health is so feeble that he would greatly prefer that some one should be selected "who could more certainly perform the pleasing duty." He promises, however, to be present on the occasion, if practicable.

Bishop George F. Pierce, of the Methodist Church Sqoth, who celebrated his "golden wedding" on the 4, inst., at Atlanta, Ga., was one of the first members of the Georgia conference, which was organized in 1831. In speaking of his early labors, he said: "My home seemed to be constantly in the saddle. I preached 24 sermons every 28 days, besides sermons on extra occasions, such as weddings, funerals and household services." In 1839, Bishop Pierce was appointed president of the first female college in the world, situated at Macon, Ga.

The Philadelphia Record gives the following as the bill of fare which Chang, the Chinese giant, consumed at a recent lunch: Four large plates of soup, forty-three fried oysters, two rare tenderloin steaks, with nineteen baked tomatoes; a large roast chicken, three bunches of celery, two custard pies, one mince pie, one apple pie, [illegible]e cream puffs, six bananas, a pou[illegible] of figs, two oranges, twenty-six ginger snaps, and eleven slices of bread and butter. He also drank eight large goblets of water and four cups of coffee.

An Atlanta Constitution correspondent says: "The other night while talking to Senator Brown, I noticed a piece of rabbit fur protruding above his collar. I asked him if he wore a rabbit's foot about his neck. 'No,' he replied, 'but I do wear a rabbit skin on my chest. A lady commended it as the best possible protection against cold. I got a fine rabbit skin, cut off the feet, and tying the two legs together with a ribbon, I tied the skin about my neck. It has worked like a charm."

The trustees of Columbia College have permitted a young woman to enter one of the highest classes in astronomy, notwithstanding the policy of the institution against coeducation. The student is a graduate of Wellesley College and is able to assist in the work of the observatory and to study in the textbooks of a high grade. In the midst of loud discussion this young woman has quietly and successfully entered the citadel.

Narrow Escape of a Cunarder.

The leaning of the public mind toward a determination to find a victim for public censure who shall be held responsible for the loss of the Columbus inclines me to send you a statement that may in some way modify the existing state of things concerning the late wreck. In the summer of 1867 I took passage in the China, of the Cunard line, for Liverpool. We had a very dismal run across the Atlantic, rain alternating with thick fog for twelve days, the ship rolling incessantly, and every night becoming a new horror in the constantly increasing fear that something would happen to the steamer. Fastnet Light," off the coast of Ireland, was seen for a few minutes during a fog-lift on the evening of the thirteenth day, and the captain told us, one and all, that our wretched passage would soon be over.

The night that followed was intensely black and very stormy, but the ship was under full sail, and was driven through tremendous seas with all steam on. I turned in about ten o'clock and slept, I should say, two hours when an irresistable—and to this day unaccountable—influence compelled me to get up and dress myself. The ship rolled fearfully, but I managed to reach the deck and grope my way, hand over hand, by the deck railing to the smoke pipe, where I stood a few minutes thoroughly appalled at the blackness of the night and the mad plunging of the vessel.

Suddenly this terrific cry came up from the deck below me: "God Almighty help us! we're going ashore. Put the ship about." I faintly saw the white waving of an arm in a shirt sleeve, and the next minute was thrown from my feet by the sudden change of the ship's course brought about by an officer's telegram to the wheelhouse.

Everything was in instant confusion, not bettered by the fact that the dark rocks of the Irish coast were plainly visible to many of the frightened passengers. The ship shook like a reed in the fierce wind that blew, for every sail was aback and headway seemed utterly impossible to make. It was a long time before the vessel answered her helm, and nothing but the naval discipline of the sailors saved the China from becoming a total wreck.

I may mention here that the captain of the ship Three Bells—the savior of the San Francisco's passengers after she was dismasted—was with us, and he assured us that in all his long life as a sailor he never had so narrow an escape from instant death. The ship was nearly upon the rocks, and at the rate she was going she would have smashed herself to pieces in a very short time.

After breakfast the next day some one said: "Let us have up the man who gave the alarm;" for we had learned that the man I saw at midnight was a steerage passenger; and soon he appeared among us, a gray haired son of the sea, seventy years of age or thereabout, who modestly said to us as we gathered about him: "Good friends, give thanks to God, and do not praise me. I only smelled the land growing nearer and nearer, and was but His humble instrument to save you."

The fact is we were drawn in some mysterious manner eight miles out of out course. Captain Hockley was widely censured by the London papers and has never been seen, so I have heard, upon the ocean since. Possibly the magnetism of the land, or the effect of the iron and steel in the ship's construction, or some powerful element of the stormy atmosphere, produced a deviation of the needle of the compass, and perhaps counter-currents or other contrary forces of resistless tides made the great ship a plaything for the treacherous seas.—Letter to Boston Journal.

Early American East Indiamen.

The credit for opening India, China, and, indeed, the entire East to American commerce is due to Elias H. Derby, a Salem merchant, born in the port in 1739. This gentleman possessed a courage and enterprise that no obstacle could daunt, and he determined to enter the rich field then monopolized by the English and Dutch East India Companies. Accordingly, in 1784, he dispatched the ship Grand Turk, under Capt. Johnathan Ingersoll, to the Cape of Good Hope on a mercantile reconnoissance, to discover the needs and capacity of the eastern market. She returned in less than a year with the information sought, was quickly reloaded, and on the 28th of November, 1785, cleared for the Isle of France, with instructions to proceed thence to Canton by way of Batavia. The ship was laden with native products—fish, flour, provisions, tobacco, spirits—and made a successful voyage, returning in June, 1787, with a cargo of teas, silks, and nankeens, the first vessel from New-England, if not from America, to enter into competition with the incorporated companies of the old world. Her success seems to have electrified the merchants of Salem, Boston and New York, and an eager rivalry for the trade ensued, with the result that when Mr. Derby's ship Astrea entered Cantan two years later she found fifteen American vessels there taking in cargo, four of them belonging to our merchant, however, who had not been slow in improving his advantages as pioneer. This was not the only pioneer work that he did. His bark Light Horse, in 1874 first opened American trade with Russia. In 1788 his ship Atlantic first displayed the American flag at Surat, Calcutta, and Bombay. Another did the same in Siam; the third was the first to open trade with Mocha. In 1790, it is said, his vessels brought into Salem 728,871 pounds of tea, these ventures being among the first in the tea trade.—Rear Admiral G. H. Preble, in the United States.

Henry Ward Beecher proposes soon to go to England, where he has not been for 20 years.

FARM AND HOUSEHOLD.

Agricultural Notes.

Wyandottes are a comparatively new breed of American fowls, but they have already found their way to England, where a contemporary thus describes them: "The birds are white in body, black-laced; saddle tail and hackle tipped with black; rose-comb; yellow legs and beak. They are of the Plymouth Rock type, but rather smaller birds, round, and perhaps more compact. They are said to be very hardy, excellent layers, and the eggs are buff-pink, and of good size."

Gooseberries succeed wonderfully in he poorest sandy soil, same as worthleberries. It is an important crop in England, particularly with the poor who had only a little garden patch. They might be made an important crop here. It is the only fruit which it is preferable to use green before being ripe and comes in just before early apples and is greatly liked for pies, and stewed for desert. Early in the season they bring a high price in New York markets and I then pick and ship mine. —Sandila.

A single system of rotation is not nor can it be applicable in all localities. The only true test of any system is its continued success. In planning a judicious rotation it is advisable to alternate with the narrow-leaved cereals, such as wheat, oats, barley or rye, those having broad leaves, such as clover, peas and the root crops. Perpendicular rooting plants and such as root horizontally ought to succeed each other. Two plants favorable to the growth of weeds ought not succeed each other. Grain and oil plants should only be grown at intervals, unless the soil is in excellent condition. Plants which prove to be the least exhaustive should invariably be alternated with those of an opposite character.—Farm and Fireside.

Here are a few useful items from the Rural New-Yorker: "Who hears of the President Garfield Tomato now? And what a splurge it did make in 1882. There are many grand varieties of the clematis, but if we could have but one it would be Jackmanii. Hereafter I shall plant radishes in the warmest, most sheltered spot that I can find, make the soil very rich and surround the bed with a frame. Why not have a climbing rose? Would it not improve the barn, wash-house, smoke-house, piazza? Most of the varieties are perfectly hardy. They bloom in profusion for a long time. Prairie Queen (pink). Bennett's Seedling (white) make a good selection. It should be borne in mind that these roses bloom on the old or searon's wood."

One reason why progress in breeding good milkers among native cows has been so slow is the fact that the influence of the male is too little understood. It has been the habit of many farmers to save only heifer calves from deep or rich milkers, while calves of the other sex were fattened as veal. It is even yet common for many farmers to use bulls chosen for size, good looks, or other merits rather than dairy prepotency. The best breeders of dairy stock now understand that it is quite as important for the progeny that the bull be from a good milk or butter strain as that the mother be a good milker.—American Cultivator.

A correspondent of the Rural New Yorker describes the following method by which an extraordinary crop of water melons was raised: Holes were dug ten feet apart each way, eighteen inches square and fifteen inches deep. These holes were filled with well-rotted manure which was thoroughly incorporated with the soil. A low, flat hill was then made and seed planted. When the vines were large enough to begin to run the whole surface was covered to the depth of a foot or fifteen inches with wheat straw. The straw was placed close up around the vines. No cultivation whatever was given afterward; no weeds or grass grew. The vines spread over the straw, and the melons matured clean and nice.

If it is desirable to combine in the manufacture of butter, we suggest that a few farmers living near each other put their milk together and manufacture the butter themselves, and after marketing divide the avails, or they could divide the butter. This would be a safer way than to establish a large concern, and could be discontinued at any time without loss. But having in mind the old proverb, "Too many cooks spoil the broth," we believe it best for every man to be on his own hook and make his own butter.

Various Household Hints.

RATS.—A writer in Chambers's Journal, after many useless experiments in trying to rid his house of rats, at last caught two alive in a trap, besmeared them all over except their heads with tar, and let them loose in their favorite run. From 1875 till now his house, though an ancient one, has been free of rats.

Buttered paper laid over the chest will often be of great benefit when a child is troubled with a cough.

A good liniment or wash to be used for burns is made of one part of linseed oil and two parts of lime water. This should be applied on the surface of the burn, and covered with fine linen or lint.

A good cough medicine is made of boiling two ounces of flax-seed in one quart of water; add rock candy to sweeten it to your taste. After straining, add also the juice of several lemons. This should be taken at night, and if possible it should be hot when taken.

A work basket or waste-paper basket which has become worn and broken at the edges may be made to serve a good purpose by lining it; have the lining quite full, bring it over the right side of the basket, hem the edge, and shir it and catch it with fine stitches to the basket. An old basket repaired in this way is even prettier than some new ones.

Two pretty tidies for the back of a small sofa which is divided into two parts are made thus: For one take three pieces of blue ribbon the length of the sofa cushion, put lace insertion of the same width as the ribbon between the strips of ribbon, trim the edge with narrow lace, not more than an inch and a half wide. For the other tidy use a contrasting color of ribbon; pink or crimson are pretty, or a fine shade of yellow will answer. Make the tidy just like the other in form.

The American Cultivator says that hanging baskets have gone out of favor, because of the untidy drip from them, and low-standing jardinieres, tastefully filled, are better liked, since to look into a plant is the only way to appreciate its loveliness. We are also reminded that in filling a jardiniere bulbs may be buried in the soil, which will give us later a truss of hyacinth, a crocus or a dainty snowdrop, a delightful surprise.

TOMBSTONES.—R. L. Writes: "I wish to erect a monument to the memory of my father of the most durable material, and would be glad if you would mention those stones that will last longest and best in our cold climate of Minnesota." Granite is very durable and resists heat and cold almost completely. It rarely becomes encrusted with moss and is almost as enduring as crude cast-iron. Slates make very durable memorial stones, and resist the action of heat even better than granite. Sandstones and marbles yield more or less readily to the influence of sun and frost and to the oxidizing effects of the atmosphere. The choice of R. L. will probably fall on either granite or a bluestone monument.—N. Y. Tribune.

For waxing stained or unstained floors we have used successfully the following recipe: Mix turpentine and beeswax in the proportion of one gallon of turpentine to one pound of wax shaved thin. Let the wax and turpentine stand over night before using; then rub on the floor with a coarse woollen cloth several times. This is much better than varnishing or shellacking, which we tried before waxing, and which wore off at once and looked badly from the first. The recipe in your issue of February 8 calls for benzine and wax, and these to be warmed over a fire. This in the hands of most people, and considering the inflammatory materials, seems a dangerous recommendation. The one I send does not require warming.

Sweet Corn Better Than Sorghum.

I do not think sorghum for fodder is near equal to the sweet varieties of corn of the smaller and medium size like the Minnesota. I have raised these crops near each other in the same kind of soil, manured and cultivated alike. The yield in fodder of both was about the same in weight. The stalks of sorghum are tougher than those of corn, and when cut up and placed in different racks cows would not touch the sorghum so long as any corn was left; nor even then unless pretty hungry; if fed to them alone they would eat only the upper part of the stalks. Cows allowed to get excessively hungry and having nothing else to eat would probably consume the entire stalk, but I do not keep my cows in that way. Sorghum stalks have probably a greater proportion of saccharine matter than that of sweet corn, and are therefore preferable to grind for making molasses, syrup and sugar; but as they are tougher they are not so palatable for feeding stock, being harder to masticate, and, I presume, to digest. Cut up and steamed, or packed in silo, they might be as greedily eaten. Sorghum does best in a light soil, and will endure a drouth rather better than corn. In consequence of this, I would advise Mr. Higbie and other farmers to cultivate a little of it every season. The best variety I have tried is the sort called Amber cane. In my latitude, 39 degrees, planted the last of April, it heads out early in July, and is then cut for fodder. Afterward there is a second growth from it, but this is not so tall and abundant as the first.—[A. B. Allen, in N. Y. Tribune.

Breaking Steers.

The orange county farmer knows of no more profitable pastime for boys than the breaking of a pair of young steers or calves to the yolk, if an extra team is likely to be needed. The calves will not only soon grow into oxen, but the actual contact of the lads with the calves, and the ups and downs in the conflict of breaking them in, will not only do the calves good, but will improve the boys from the healthy exercise of bone and muscle it always affords. If the boys are young, begin with a well matched pair of spring calves, and lose no time in providing a suitable yoke to commence the training. Never use the gad on them, nor tie their tails together to prevent the turning of the yoke. On the contrary feed them a few griddle cakes until they get well acquainted with you. Teach them to walk by your side, and to carry their heads up by gently tapping them with the butt end of your gad under the chin, and then they will soon learn to back, haw and gee, and the boys will have a team which will soon aid in carrying grists to the mill, or hauling stones on a stone-boat for building or repairing fences, and much other work required of a team of horses.

Wire Fences.

The objection to wire fences, which on their first appearance was quite strong, has nearly or quite passed away. This objection rested altogether upon the injury horses and cattle were likely to suffer by running against them; but as these accidents have proved so rare of late, and the reports of them having been shown to be greatly exaggerated, we hear no more of them. No doubt that now and then a horse or a cow may be more or less hurt by being forced against the barbs but as these barbs are very short it is impossible to see how any serious injury, can be sustained from them. Animals are sometimes hurt by a stone wall, or an ordinrry post and rail fence, or by attempting to jump over, or passing through where there is a broken rail; or may be badly injured by falling into a hole or a ditch, and if they were all reported it would probably be shown that there would be as many as caused by the wire fence. As a mere matter of protecting the premises against incessant and damaging trespassing, the value of the barbed fence will prove to be inestimable.—Germantown Telegraph.

Carpets.

Changes of fashion occur in our carpets as in dress. Last year sombre and subdued colors and neutral tints prevailed; now brilliant tints and high contrasting colors are in ascendent. The reaction in fashionable styles of carpets, however extreme, is usually traceable to long operating influences, and it is for manufacturers to discern in advance the tendency of the public taste. The present patterns of carpets are of an all over description, without central figures. For certain accepted patterns of old standing there is a constant demand, but periodic novelties are the rule.

There is too much study not only in costly but in cheap carpets, of the dainty effects of contrasts, as in yellow and orange, with or without lighter colors, blue and lilac, scarlet and crimson, or white divided by faint blue. Carpets admit of demi-tints, but no shades. Ecru grounds are just now the most popular for the richer descriptions of carpets. The variety of patterns that are turned out allow of the carpets selected for the rooms of a house to represent the individual taste of the occupant, and thus on individual grounds creating pleasure in additon to the merits they may possess as agreeable compositions.

In the way of direction in choice of patterns, so far as colors are concerned, we would state that combination of colors that would not be pleasing in a dress are unsuited for carpets and will never look well in a room. A tailor has made a very effective stair carpet of patterns neatly sewn together, as in patchwork, and edged with scarlet two inches wide. He has taken care to have the patterns all the same size, and they look like thick striped material.

High Toned Lenten Costumes.

Soft gray cashmere, dove-gray Ottoman and Vigogne toilets, and fragrant English violets are the most noticeable things just at present, for the reason that it is Lent. Soft gray, delicately toned with lace, is becoming, and violets are in season. Violets are certainly the rage just now, but sad to relate, they are not always real—the idea being to make the artificial ones appear so by perfuming them delicately with the sweet extract of the real blossom. This is better than no violets at all, but the favored ones of fortune, who care not how many dollars they lavish upon the florist, are to be envied as they walk forth adorned, aye, beautified, by great generous bunches of these blossoms—Nature's potent harbingers of spring. Large clusters are placed on the right side of the hat and the left side of the throat, fastened with a slender steel dagger, with their stems showing—the more and the longer the stems the more fashionable. One young lady, whose Lenten costume consists of a black nun's cloth, made in a severe monastic style, carries each morning a good-sized muff of black fox upon the top of which is gracefully fastened a superb cluster of Lenten lilies, the pure white flowers forming a striking contrast to the raven-black costume.

Compressed Matters.

In a recent lecture in New York by Col. Albert G. Browne, Jr. said: Chili has not only advanced into the position of the controlling power on the west coast of South Africa, but by her naval strength she can if she pleases at this moment command the Pacific coast of the United States. Any one of her three iron clads can sink every wooden vessel in our wretched navy, and the contrast between her ability and our impotence is a daily shame to every citizen of our country who resides or travels between Panama and Cape Horn.

Luminous harness is the latest device used in England to make a dark horse visible at night. A phosphoric paint applied to the blinkers, collar, and other prominent parts of the trappings, is used to bring about the result, and the night trotter, thus prepared, is said to resemble chain lightning as he plunges into the darkness of the countryside.

Upon the west flank of the Alleghany Mountains, in the State of West Virginia, eastern Kentucky and Tennessee and the territory contiguous thereto, is a region larger in area than the entire kingdom of Great Britain, and with greater and richer deposits of coal, and greater and richer deposits of iron than were originally to be found within her boundaries. Great Britain is now raising from her pits, annually, 150,000,000 tons of coal, and from her ore deposits is making 8,000,000 tons of iron and steel.

A remarkable instance of hereditary longevity is reported from Scotland. In a family of eight sons and one daughter the united ages of the nine amount to 572. Their great-grandfather was born in 1624. One of his great-grand-daughters is still alive in her 80th year, while a grandson lived to be one of the founders of the Scottish railway system, having projected the line from Renfrew to Paisley. He was provost of Renfrew during the French Revolution, and died in 1837, 213 years after the birth of his grandfather.

Skillful Surgical Operation.

On Friday last Dr. Thorndike, assisted by the house surgeons, performed an operation upon a man who had been sick with a cancer in the City Hospital. The operation was an extraordinary one, says the Herald, but the sick man is doing well, and will in all probability recover. His name is Edward L. Waite. The cancer was in the mouth, and was so far advanced that death must have ensued in a short time had nothing been done. The surgeons took away the lower jaw and tongue, removed the floor of the mouth, the glands of the neck and the skin over the jaw and mouth. The disease was then entirely cut out, and they proceeded to establish artificial organs, which thus far have performed the necessary service satisfactorily. By drawing up the skin from the neck a lower lip was made, which only falls an inch or so short of closing and forming a nearly perfect mouth, and in time the skin will be drawn up from the chest to fill the vacancy above, and later the skin below the chest will be in turn drawn up to take the place of the lap received from above it. The operation is said to be the first of the kind performed succesfully in the country.

On Saturday Dr. Gay, assisted by the hospital house surgeons preformed a scarcely less extensive operation on Frank Learnard for the same disease. Cancer had got a dead grip on its victim, and to effectually stop its progress it was necessary to remove the whole of the shoulder blade and half of the collar bone. This is said to be the sixth operation of the kind performed in the country. Learnard is now in a comfortable condition, and strong hopes are entertained of his ultimate recovery. —Boston Advertiser.

CROOKSTON, MINNESOTA.

Signs of the breaking up of winter increase and also of a good deal of moisture on account of the melting of heavy snows. But in this northern region no fears are entertained of disasters such as attended the breaking up in the Ohio valley.

The generosity of the American people in time of need is shown by the amounts sent to the sufferers by the Ohio floods. The total amount placed in the hands of the relief committee was $127,468 55, of which over $115,000 has been already expended. In Cincinnati the voluntary contributions reached over $60,000.

Boston has resolved that women shall receive the same wages as men who do the same work in the public schools. Its council voted to give a woman in charge of a grammar school $2,000 per annum, the same received by men in the same grade. This is only simply justice, providing the woman does her work as well as the man. And here lies the difficulty in the question of wages.

Senator Anthony attributes his recent very severe illness to the smoking of cigarettes. Just why these little paper rolls of tobacco are worse than ordinary cigars, does not fully appear, but they are so declared by physicians and others competent to express judgment upon them. Excessive smoking whether of cigarettes or cigars, is the parent of much functional disorder, especially of the heart and liver. "You have a tobacco heart," has come to be a common exclamation of physicians, after applying the stethoscope to persons suffering from palpitation, intermittent action, of the heart, etc. Abstinence in most cases is the only sure remedy.

Uncle Rufus Hatch, the noted New York financer, still continues a roaring bull, and looks for a return of confidence and higher prices in all dividend paying stocks. He says the present condition is the outgrowth of over-productiveness in all kinds of securities and of grain and provisions; that there has been a lack of confidence in railroad management and over-speculation, and that the trouble with grain is that it has been sold at such high prices that the rest of the world has undersold this country in all the products of the soil. Mr. Hatch was formerly a growling bear, but, strange to say, as he grows older, takes a more cheerful view of things.

The New York Financial Chronicle lets a good deal of the wind out of the alarmist reports regarding the payment of high rates for the right to call gold at a premium during the current year. It says: "So far as the bidding for the privilege of calling gold at a premium is concerned, it may be dismissed as merely sensational, intended for effect upon the stock market, and to keep alive an unsettled feeling in the community. Although several bids have been reported we hear of but one actual transaction, and that was the payment of one quarter of 1 per cent. to call $1,000,000 gold at 101 for the remainder of the year. This, presumably, is the bid which was announced by telegraph in a very different shape. The dispatch stated that parties in New York were reported as bidding $50,000 for the right to call $1,000,000 gold at 101 at any time in twelve months. As one-fourth of 1 per cent. is only $2,500, the amount named in the telegram was a twenty-fold multiplication of the real figures. Even the actual payment was a clear waste of a considerable sum of money, but the reported price showed sheer lunacy. There is not a shadow of a chance that any person who buys a right to call gold at a premium during the present year will ever have anything for his money save the conviction that he invested it very foolishly.

The national debt in December 1883, less the cash in the treasury was $1,509,785,060, and the interest charge was $59,760,131. This interest charge included $3,877,887 paid for interest on bonds issued to the Pacific railroad companies. In 1829 the interest paid on Pacific railroad bonds was only $1,794,857, or less than half the amount paid last year. The debt has been reduced in the fifteen years named $1,15,678,200 and the interest charge, by nearly 60 per cent. The smallest reduction of the debt in any one year was $4,730,472 in 1874, and the greatest was $151,684,351 in 1882. At the rate of payment in 1882 the whole debt, less the cash in the treasury, would be paid, if it could be called at its face, in less than ten years. The largest amount of revenue ever received from customs in the history of the government was $220,410,730 in the fisca year ending June 30, 1862, and the nex largest amount in any year was $214,706,496 in 1883. The largest amount ever collected as internal revenue was $309,226,813 in 1866 and the smallest in any year since then was $108,784 in 1874. The government issued to the several Pacific railroad companies $64,623,512 in bonds. This debt bears 6 per cent. interest and the government pays the interest and is responsible for the principal. These Pacific railroad bonds will be due July 2, 1884. The national debt per capita is now $28 41 and the annual interest charge per capita is 95 cents. The debt per capita was heaviest per capita August 31, 1865, when it was $78 25 and the annual interest per capita was $4-29. The debt bore on the people four and a half times as heavy in 1865 as it does now.

NEWS OF THE WEEK SUMMARIZED.

From the National Capital.

Miss Eva Hersey and Miss Gertrude Nelson of St. Paul are guests of Senator Sabin in Washington.

Ex-Representative Burrows of Michigan is said to be the selection of the president for the vacancy in the office of the assistant secretary of the treasury, recently held by John C. New.

A dinner was given Tuesday evening the 11th by Senator Sabin to a number of Minneapolis people. Among the guests were Mr. and Mrs. Dudley Hersey, Miss Eva Hersey, Miss Gertrude Nelson and Maj. Camp.

The secretary of the navy has received a communication from Capt. G. S. Nares, R. N., embodying the views of himself, Maj. H. W. Fielden, H. M. A., and Capt. A. H. Markham, R. N., making suggestions for the conduct of the expedition to be sent to the relief of the Greely party. The opinion is expressed that the chances are very good that the party will be found and brought away in safety.

The bill has gone back to the house for concurrence in the senate amendments, and is covered by 100 senate bills now lying there. In other words the Porter bill goes at the foot of the list, all the others taking precedence over it in regular order. There are only two methods by which it can be reached out of order. One is by unanimous consent, which of course cannot be procured in the face of the bitter opposition to the measure. The other is by suspension of the rules for the purpose of going to the speaker's table, and it will require a two-thirds vote to carry this. The latter plan will be adopted by the friends of the bill, and by having all the democrats on hand it is believed the necessary vote can be mustered.

Railroad and River News.

Mrs. R. F. Hettinger of Mansfield, Ohio, eloped with A. M. Roper, a traveling evangelist.

The Wisconsin, Pittsville & Superior railroad, of which Hon. George Hills is president, is to be extended north a distance of twenty-two miles. A large number of men are already employed in clearing off the right of way on the present line. The extension will likely reach Marshfield, Wis. It is the intention of the projectors to push the road ultimately to Superior City.

Casualties of the Week.

Missouri Valley, Iowa, special: Hydrophobia is growing rampant in this and adjoining counties. Many farmers continue to lose stock. One man has lost eighteen head of cattle, and other heavy losses are reported.

Denver Special: The Aspen stage, which arrived at Leadville at midnight, brought the news of a fatal snow slide, which occurred in the Aspen mountains last Monday night, the 10th. Three employes of the Vallejo mine, George Marshall, William O'Brien and J. McGinnity, were killed, and M. Higgins is missing.

Chippewa Falls, Special: R. E. Browster of Bay City, Mich., fell dead in the trail within ten rods of the camp, Thursday the 13th, while prospecting and running lines sixty miles up the river. He was a man of wealth and position, a brother of Mrs. Gen. Early and L. D. Browster of this city. He leaves a wife, son and daughter at Bay City, Mich. The remains were taken to Scio, N. Y., for interment in the family vault, the brother accompanying them. The deceased was fifty-one years old, and an esteemed gentleman.

At Grand Rapids, Mich., on the 12th inst., a fire started in Stradon's woolen mills, and destroyed that, the Novelty Manufacturing company's works, Richmond's box factory, all three in the same building. The flames then spread to Comstock's saw mill, Clark & Ocker's sash and door factory, Bissell's mammoth carpet-sweeper factory, and the felt boot company's works. The carpet-sweeper factory's loss is $75,000; partly insured. The felt boot company's loss is $10,000; insured for $6,500, the other losses being a total of fully $100,000. A gale was blowing at the time. The losses are now reported to be $150,000; insurance less than $50,000.

Crimes and Criminals.

Ignatius Harper shot and killed Charles Howard, at Columbus, Ohio, in an altercation about the former's intimacy with the latter's wife.

The rooms of Annie E. Snow, at the Waverly house, a family hotel in Boston, were entered the 12th, and property aggregating $4,300 in value stolen.

The Massachusetts prison commissioners propose putting the old, hardened criminals by themselves, and making an effort to reform the younger ones.

Young Cash, the South Carolina murderer, is still at large, the posse sent out by the governor having failed to find him. It is thought Cash will now surrender to the county authorities, in accordance with the wishes of his father.

Seneca Miller, another of the three men who threw a dynamite cartridge into a residence at Pawling, N. Y., was convicted of murder in the second degree. Mulkins, the third man, then pleaded guilty of murder in the second degree. Each was sentenced to life imprisonment.

Two men, Classey and Weaver, were arrested in Chicago for robbing Thomas Powers' house of $4,000 some weeks ago. Rev. Father Corbott has given up $1,036, but refuses to say who gave it to him. It is supposed this was the share of one of the gang, who confessed the crime to the priest.

At Marcum's Mill, Ky., Asa Cantrell was shot by John Marcum. Cantrell and Marcum had an altercation, but were separated by friends. Later Cantrell bared his breast and dared Marcum to shoot, which he did, killing him instantly. Marcum is but seventeen years old. Cantrell was aged forty-five, and was a desperate character.

Col. Cash was brought by habeas corpus before Judge Simpson at Columbia, S. C., on application for discharge. The application was denied, but the prisoner was admitted to bail in $2,500, to answer the charge of being accessory after the fact to the murder of Richards. The bond was also made a peace bond, and signed by Cash, John Agnew and W. J. Debesihl.

It transpired late last Thursday night that Frederick J. Deitrich, teller in the Laclede bank of St. Louis, is a defaulter to the amount of about $30,000. It appears Deitrich left the city two weeks ago on a leave of absence. Two or three days later the defalcation was discovered, but had been kept quiet until the 13th. The Laclede bank will lose nothing, as the Fidelity and Casuality company are on his bond for $20,000, and he had given personal bonds in the same amount.

A sensation was produced at Scranton, Pa., by the suicide of Andrew J. Weaver, a brother of ex-Congressman Weaver of Iowa. At the breakfast table he manifested sullenness and ate little and then he assailed his daughter. Eventually he produced a revolver and threatened to shoot her. She eluded him and he began to demolish the furniture. His son went to the house and pacified him. The father then lay upon the lounge for half an hour, when he arose, went into another room and shot himself.

Items of General News.

The schedules of assignment of Jacob J. Billups & Co., cotton dealers of New York, show liabilities of $680,000. Nominal assets, $782,000. Exact assets, $1,050.

J. F. McKinley, ex-member of congress, and H. H. Smiley, of Piqua, Ohio, indicted for receiving unlawful fees in pension cases were admitted to bail in Cincinnati by Judge Sage of the United States district court, in $1,000 each.

Personal Mention.

Henry A. Tilden, youngest brother of Samuel J. Tilden died at Lebanon, N. Y. aged sixty-three.

Nathaniel Byron Page, the actor and playwright, known on the stage as Teddy Byron, died in New York.

Dr. Lunsford Yandell, who had a national reputation as a physician and medical writer, died suddenly at Louisville the 12th of neuralgia of the heart.

Tuesday, Feb. 26, Mrs. Ozel Stockwell, of Fichburg, Mass. gave birth to a daughter, and Wednesday, March 5, one week and one day after, another daughter was born to her.

Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton has returned to Johnston, in Fulton county, N. Y., to pass the remainder of her days in the old Cady homestead, where she was born sixty-eight years ago.

The marriage of Lieut. John W. Danenhower, of Jeannette fame, and Miss Helen Laflen Sloan, daughter of ex-Speaker Sloan, occurred at Christ church Oswego, N. Y., at 11 o'clock Wednesday morning. The groom was in citizen's dress, and the whole affair was quiet but elegant. The party started for the West. After the bridal trip they will reside in Washington.

Foreign Flashes.

Crowds follow Mary Anderson in London as she goes to mass, and the ladies say of her: "Oh, she is so pious—and such a lovely arm!"

Natives recently attacked European factories on the Lower Congo, plundered caravans, and killed several Europeans. Assistance has been sent the distressed settlers.

The death of the baroness Lionel de Rothschild is announced. She was the daughter of Baron Charles de Rothschild of Naples and was married to her cousin in 1836.

Gladstone's indisposition is said to be owing to disagreement with the marquis of Huntington, secretary of state for war, that England must control the Red Sea ports of Egypt.

Much anxiety is felt in regard to the situation at Khartoum. The Times Alexander special says: "It is proverbial that three courses are possible: To leave Gen. Gordon to his fate; to dispatch English troops to Khartoum, or to import Indian troops. The policy of doing nothing has not hitherto achieved signal success."

Solomon Shapira, who recently attempted to sell in England a forged manuscript book of the Pentateuch, killed himself in a hotel in Rotterdam. He had not left his room for several days. The police forced the door and found the blood-bespattered corpse upon the bed. Letters showed he was suffering from mental aberration.

Paris Correspondent of the Times: The occupation of Bacninh ends in nothing. The rainy season begins in a fortnight and will postpose operations six months. The delta of the Red river is handed over to pillage and anarchy. The French government will shortly be compelled to ask for a credit of 25,000,000 francs, and eventually for 100,000,000 francs, which the chamber will certainly refuse. The expedition will require sixty-three ships and 400,000 men. The end to be gained is out of all proportion to the outlay.

A passage at arms occurred last week betwee Gen. Wallace and the grand vizier at Constantinople. Acting under instructions from Washington, Gen. Wallace has lately been pressing the porte very hard for a settlement of the petroleum question and American claims generally. The grand vizier, irritated at such persistency, refused to receive Minister Wallace when the latter sought an audience for the special purpose of demanding some official answer to his various long-standing demands, pleading an engagement on important business. An angry official correspondence ensued, in which the pretension was advanced that ministers have not the same right to approach the grand vizier at all times as embassadors possess.

A dispatch from Gen. Graham, date Osman Digma's Camp, March 13, 10:30 a. m., says: "The camp of the enemy has been taken, after hard fighting since 8 a. m. Over seventy British were killed and 100 wounded." Later dispatches say the bivouac last night was exceedingly unpleasant. The Arabs kept up a persistent fusilade until just before daybreak. The bright moonlight rendered objects distinctly visible at a long distance, but prevented the enemy from making a sudden onset. The rebels directed their fire toward the hospital wagons, which were most conspicious. The surgeons and Gen. Graham's staff officers had many narrow escapes. At sunrise a Gardiner gun and a nine pounder were turned against the rebels, who were within 1,300 yards of the British position, and afforded a most elegant target. The Arabs were soon compelled to retire to their main position near Tomai Wells. Col. Stewart's cavalry arrived at 6:30, and took a position on the British left, so as to turn the enemy's right. Gen. Graham has taken quarters for the present in the camp from which Osman Digma and the rebel hostiles were driven. The enemy fought most stubbornly, and the battle was much heavier than the engagement at Teb. The sailors, the Black Watch regiment, and York and Lancaster regiments suffered the heaviest losses.

A Mining Horror.

There was an explosion in the coal mines at Pocahontas, Tazewell county, Va., on the 12th inst., and nearly 150 miners were killed. On account of the soft coal found there, which is completely saturated with fire damp, the mine was considered unsafe. From the first there was no hope of rescuing any of the victims alive. A number of bodies were found horribly mangled, and the heat becoming too great to penetrate further, the mines were sealed, that being considered the most feasible way to extinguish the fire.

A Great Robber Caught.

At Milwaukee, on Thursday last, Prentiss Tiller, the Pacific Express company's agent at St. Louis, who decamped with nearly $100,000 a few days ago, was arrested at 10 o'clock in the morning by a Milwaukee detective, and $90,000 in money recovered. A young man looking like a tramp, with a small moustache, brown hair, slight build, unobtrusive features and about 135 pounds in weight, bought a trunk at the store of Carpeles Schram, on Tuesday, and asked to have it shipped to G. H. Pachen, Detroit, Mich. He left a valise, which he asked to have placed inside the trunk to save him the trouble of carrying it. When about to put the valise in the trunk the clerk dropped it and the clasps burst asunder, the bulging contents rolling out upon the floor. On gathering up the bundles he found them wrapped in Pacific Express company's labels, and a closer examination disclosed that every package contained a prize, the total amounting to nearly $90,000. The police were notified, and with a discription of the man traced him to a cheap boarding house in the Third ward, but he was not at home. They found his trunk and seized it. As the boarding-house people said the man was frequently out all night, the police continued to search the city, thinking he must be on a spree. This morning he returned to the trunk store to ask about his valise and was arrested. The reward foots up about $10,000, $5,000 for the capture of the thief and 10 per cent. of the money found. There are those who think the money should be divided between the detective force who assisted in the search and arrest and the clerk who first discovered the money.

Final Passage of the Fitz John Porter Bill.

The bill for the relief of General Fitz John Porter, passed the senate on Tuesday, after speeches by Senators Manderson and Logan against it. The vote was, 36 to 25. The senators who voted for the passage of the bill were all Democrats, except Hoar of Massachusetts, Jones of Nevada, Pike of New Hampshire, Riddleberger of Virginia, Sabin of Minnesota, and Sewell of New Jersey.

During the vote the following pairs were announced: Beck aye with Hale no; Cameron (Wis.) aye with George no; Miller (N. Y.) no with Camden aye; Plumb no with Vest aye; Sawyer no with Kenna.

The preamble to the Porter bill as passed recites that—

The board of office convened by the president to examine and report upon the case of Gen. Porter, stated that justice required the president to annul the findings and sentence of the court martial in Gen. Porter's case and restore him to the position of which the sentence deprived him, such restoration to take effect from the date of dismissal from the service; that the president remitted so much of the sentence as disqualified Gen. Porter from holding office, and that in order to do justice to Gen. Porter it was enacted, etc. The bill then authorizes the president, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, to appoint Gen. Porter to the position of colonel in the army, the same grade and rank held by him at the time of his dismissal; and authorizes the president in his discretion to place Gen. Porter on the retired list as of that grade; Gen. Porter, however, to receive no compensation or allowance prior to his appointment under the act.

The bill as reported from the senate committee was amended by striking out the provision for the restoration of Porter, "to all the rights, titles and privileges of the rank held by him at the time of his dismissal from the army." This is the amendment which necessitates the return of the bill to the house.

It is reported that possibly President Arthur may veto the bill as there is a great pressure on him to do so.

Great Fire in Michigan.

A fire started shortly before noon on the 12th on the west side of the business quarter of the village of Allegan, twenty-five miles northwest of Kalamazoo, Mich., and under a high west wind swept through the entire district to the river, taking every brick store building in the place, except the Chaffee hotel and Peck's bank building. The fire had run its course in two hours. The aggregate loss is placed by Allegan business men at $400,000 to $500,000—probably a high estimate. The insurance it is believed will amount to $150,000. Help was telegraphed for, and sent by the fire departments of Kalamazoo and Muskegon and Holland. Among the business places burned were the Sherman house, the First National bank, and three newspaper offices, viz: The Journal, Gazette and Democrat. The principal building was known as the Union block, containing five stores, which cost $60,000, and now estimated as worth $40,000. Three of the stores were owned by the Hall estate of Allegan; half insured. J. K. Wagner and the Fleming estate of Kalmazoo owned the other two; Wagner's insurance $2,000. The Sherman house block was owned by D. H. Moon of Allegan. Loss $35,000; partly insured. The hotel furniture was owned by J. Osgood. Loss, $8,000; no insurance. The heaviest business was that of the co-operative general store of Allegan grange societies. Loss on stock, $40,000; no insurance.

A Real Tragedy in a Texan Theatre.

Two men named Thompson and Fisher, who had been drinking together, entered the San Antonio theatre in each other's company. They met a man named Foster in the dress circle, and some words were exchanged, bringing about a melee, during which Thompson and Fisher were killed and Foster wounded. The circle was quickly cleared, the occupants jumping into the parquette below and through the side windows into the street. No one seems to know who fired the first shot, or how many were engaged in the shooting. After the firing, Thompson's brother put in an appearance, but was promptly arrested. The remains of the two victims were taken in charge by a host of friends, and obsequies have been ordered on the grandest scale, regardless of expense. The theatre where the affray occurred was the scene last year of the killing, by Thompson, of Jack Harris, then proprietor of the place. Fisher and Thompson were probably the two most desperate and widely-known men in Texas, and have each killed a fabulous number of their fellow citizens. At the inquest, the jury found that the killing was justifiable, and done in self-defense. There was no direct testimony as to who did the shooting, but evidence went to show that Foster one of the proprietors who refused to shake hands with Thompson, who was drunk and had a year before killed Foster's partner.

Order Against Dynamiters.

The following circular has been issued in Washington:

Department of Justice, Washington, March 12, 1884. To District Attorneys and Marshals of the United States: By direction of the president I have to inform you that it is reported certain persons are aiding in the prosecution of various heinous crimes by shipping to foreign parts explosives dangerous in the highest degree to life and property. No proof has been adduced that this rumor is founded upon fact, and the president cannot believe it truth. The honor of this nation, however, requires that it should not be open to the imputation, unfounded though it be, of the slightest appearance of tolerating such crimes, whether to be committed against our people or those of other countries. Your attention is therefore called to sections 5353, 5354, 5355, 4278 and 4279, Revised Statutes of the United States, which regulate the shipment of explosives and the punishment of those who infringe on their provisions, and you are instructed to be diligent in your efforts to prevent the offences described, and to detect and prosecute those who have or may commit them. Very respectfully.

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney General.

A Good Record for Mormons.

The criminal census of 1881 showed fifty-one prisoners in the Utah penitentiary. Mormons constitute 83 per cent. of the population, and hence should have furnished forty-two of these prisoners; but instead they furnished only five, and two of these were in for polygamy. The Salt Lake county jail contained six convicts, and by the same proportion five of these should have been Mormons; but instead not a Mormon was there and only three had been there in five years. The Salt Lake city prison, at the same time, contained twenty-nine convicts. Three-fourths of the city population were Mormons, and hence we should expect twenty-two of these prisoners to come from them; but instead not a Mormon was among them. The Gentile fourth of the city had furnished the prison with every one of its criminals.

Another Wisconsin Murder.

Waupaca, Wis., Special.—Peter Vierka, a German farmer over eighty years old, was found near his barn, in the town of Lind, this morning brutally murdered. His head was split open, and the brains had run out upon the snow. A bloody ax was found in the snow some thirty feet distant, where it had evidently been thrown by the murderer. The gash on the head was five inches long and four inches deep, and must have caused instant death. James Harris a young man working for Vierka, is suspected of the crime. He calls himself Wild Bill of the West, and has devoted much time lately to reading dime novels and other highly sensational literature. He is now under arrest for the murder. Vierka was an old and respected resident of the town of Lind, and there seems to be no well-founded reason why his life should be so suddenly and brutally taken.

Gen. Grant in Bad Condition.

A republican representative who has just returned from Fortress Monroe, said he was surprised to see how much Gen. Grant has changed during his recent illness. From newspaper reports he had supposed that Grant was getting well, but he found the old commander fallen away, his face twisted out of shape, with inflammatory rheumatism tending toward the upper portion of his limbs and bearing every appearance of a man whose time on earth is limited to a few months or a few years, at least. He looks very badly and like a man who has outlived both legs and stomach. He doubts very much if Grant ever gets well. This was a discouraging view, he said, but the others who called on Grant agreed with it.

Lansdowne Entirely Safe.

Ottawa, Ont., Special:—Your correspondent has been informed by Governor General Lansdowne that there is not one vestage of truth in the statement telegraphed New York and Boston leading papers that he had been in receipt of threatening letters and letters warning him of impending danger. He enjoys himself at Rideau Hall splendidly and without restraint, having nobody on guard or hindrance, partakes freely in fashionable tobogganing parties and parliamentary dinners and prominent social events during the session. The guard of Rideau Hall has not been increased, nor any precautions taken to prevent injury to Lord Lansdowne, as none is anticipated.

National Forest Reservation.

The bill introduced in the senate by Edmunds to provide for the establishment of a forest reservation at the headwaters of the Missouri river, and at the headwaters and Clark's Fork of the Columbia river, provides that—

A tract of land in the territory of Montana, embracing an area of about 6,000 square miles, the boundaries of which are described in the bill, be reserved and withdrawn from settlement, occupancy or sale, and dedicated and set apart forever as a natural forest reservation for the preservation of national forests protecting the headwaters and tributaries of the Columbia and Missouri river.

The bodies of ten of the victims of the snow slide at Woodstock, Colorado on the 10th inst., have been recovered. They are George Alexander, Michael Shea, J. Cashemell, Joseph Tracy, Andrew Christopher, Martin Christopher, Kate Marsilla and Maggie Doyle, children of the Widow Doyle, who with Miss Dallon and Hugh Alexander, was rescued, and may recover. The bodies of the operator, J. G. Brown, of Chateaugay, N. Y., Joseph Rivers, and John Mulhollan have not yet been recovered.

CONGRESSIONAL SUMMARY.

Bills and resolutions have been introduced in the senate proposing a constitutional amendment limiting the amount of legal tender notes to $350,000,000, unless congress by a two-thirds affirmative vote in both houses decides otherwise; authorizing the United States to resume possession of certain lands granted Iowa to aid in the construction of railroads.

Bills and resolutions have been introduced in the House incorporating the Yellowstone Park railroad; for a constitutional amendment prohibiting the making of anything but gold and silver coin legal tender except after a declaration of war; for carrying on the improvement and repair of rivers and harbors by contract; granting copyright to newspapers. The bill to incorporate the Spokane Falls & Cœur d'Alene Railroad company was reported favorably. A message was received from the president transmitting the house resolution on the death of Edward Lasker, returned by Prince Bismarck. Mr. Hiscock at once offered a resolution expressing surprise and regret at the action of the German chancellor and reiterating the expression of regret at Herr Lasker's death.

The resolutions introduced in the house by Mr. Hiscock, on the Lasker business, and referred to the committee on foreign affairs were as follows: Whereas, it has come to the house that a communication of it to the parliament of the German empire, entirely friendly in its intent, respectful in its character, and sent through regular channels of international communications, has been arbitrarily intercepted and returned by a person now holding the position of chancellor of the German empire, therefore be it

Resolved, That this house cannot but express surprise and regret that it should be even temporarily within the power of a single too powerful subject to interfere with such a simple, natural and spontaneous expression of kindly feeling between two great nations, and thus to detract from the position and prestige of the crown on one hand, and from the rights of representatives of the people on the other.

Resolved, That this house does hereby reiterate the expression of sincere regret at the death of Edward Lasker, and its sympathy with the parliament of the German empire, of which for many years he was a distinguished member.

The Mexican treaty has been ratified by the senate, but it had a narrow escape. When it was up before it was defeated by one vote. This time it was carried by one vote, and that was cast by Senator Pike of New Hampshire, was the only one to change his views since the matter has been lying dormant. The opposition to the ratification of the treaty was based upon three articles, the same being lumber, sugar and tobacco; but it is not believed by its advocates that any of those articles will be imported from Mexico into the United States to an extent that will interfere with the producers on this side of the border. The treaty will open an enormous market for manufactured articles from the United States, as the Mexican duty upon wearing apparel, cured meats and other necessaries of life has been practically prohibitory, while the tax upon wines and other luxuries has been very low.

Senator Allison presented a memorial from the Iowa legislature in favor of the regulation of inter-state commerce. Bills were introduced to suspend for two years the coinage of silver dollars, and issue $1 and $2 treasury notes; making Lake Borgne an outlet to improve the low-water navigation of the Mississippi from Cairo to New Orleans. The following nominations were sent to the Senate: J. E. Irish, Wisconsin, consul at Cognac; Abram J. Gifford, New York, agent Indians, Fort Berthold agency, Dakota; Elliot S. N. Morgan, Wyoming, secretary of Wyoming; Lewis L. Wheelock, postmaster, Owatonna, Minn.

The senate confirmed:—Col. John Newton, chief engineer with rank of brigadier general; Norman Buck, Idaho, associate justice of the supreme court of Idaho; W. F. Fitzgerald, Mississippi, associate justice of the supreme court of Arizona; John C. Perry, New York, chief justice of the supreme court of Wyoming.

In the House, under the call of committees, reports were submitted by Mr. McCoid, judiciary committee, providing for two additional associate justices for Dakota. By Mr. Rosecrans, military affairs, favorably, the bill to authorize the Cheyenne, Black Hills & Montana Railroad company to build across the foot of Russell and Laramie military reservations; also, favorably, the bill to place Col. George W. Getty on the retired list as major general. Mr. Morgan, same committee, reported adversely the bill to construct a macadamized road from Memphis, Tenn., to the National cemetery near that city. Mr. Perkins, favorably, committee on Indian affairs, for the sale of the Kickapoo diminished reservation, Kansas. A long partisan debate took place on Monday.

In the house Gov. Wakefield has presented a remonstrance from about a hundred prominent citizens of Martin county, against any action by the public lands committee looking to the forfeiture of railroad grants of Southern Minnesota.

Mr. Wakefield also introduced a bill in the house to-day to authorize the president to appoint John S. Allman, of Henderson, Minn., late a first lieutenant of the United States army a first lieutenant in the army and thereupon place him upon the retired list as such lieutenant.

Mr. Strait presented to the house a petition of 173 citizens of Renville county, Minn., praying for the forfeiture of the grant of land made to the Hastings & Dakota Railroad company, for the reason of the great injustice and gross frauds that have been practiced by the railroad companies against the settlers.

A petition was presented in the house by Mr. Nelson from A. W. Sites, asking that a clause be embodied in the bill to repeal the timber culture act, permitting all who have claims under this act, and who have failed to complete their entries for any cause beyond their control, to pay for the same at the rate of $1.25 per acre, or less.

An attempt was made in the senate on the 11th to secure an appropriation for the suppression of the foot and mouth disease that is raging among the cattle in the west. Senators Cullom, Plumb, Warner, Miller and others urged haste in the matter, as there was a need of immediate relief to prevent the spread of the plague; but the extreme state rights men insisted upon ventilating their views. The most vigorous opposition they received was from one of their own number, Senator Garland of Arkansas, who took radical grounds in favor of the powers of congress, and is recognized as one of the ablest lawyers in the senate, his remarks created some surprise, as Garland said there were no constitutional objections raised when money was appropriated for the Mississippi river floods and the yellow fever sufferers, but the shoe is on the Northwestern foot this time.

The house devoted a great deal of time to the discussion of a bill to grant a pension to Septemia R. Meikleham, the only surviving grandchild of the author of the declaration of independence. She sat in a front seat in the members' gallery and was an attentive listener to the discussion. Though in comparative want, she has made no appeal to her grandfather's country through its representatives, for aid. It was only recently that a member of the committee on pensions heard of her existence, and without consultation or request from her, introduced the bill for relief. After a long debate, the enacting clause was stricken out by over a two-thirds vote which is the same thing as defeating the bill.

MINNESOTA NEWS NOTES.

Some unknown person attempted to wreck the passenger train on the Northern Pacific, at Detroit, Minn., by turning the switch. Fortunately, it was discovered just in time to save the train of thirteen loaded coaches.

Miss Allie White of Duluth has begun suit against the city to recover $3,000 for damages received by reason of a defective sidewalk.

The president has nominated Judge Wheelock for Owatonna's postmaster.

St. Paul's city engineer, Somers, was unanimously re-elected.

The Republican congressional committee of the first district met in this city Monday. All the counties were represented, except Fillmore, Houston and Olmsted. It was resolved to hold a convention within the district to elect two delegates to the national Republican convention, and to hold a seperate convention to nominate a congressman. The chairman was authorized to fix the date of the convention after the call for the state convention has been issued. Winona was chosen as the place for holding the convention, and the number of delegates will be the same as in the Rochester convention of 1882.

Dr. Lyon, a New York chemist, has analyzed the water from an artesian well in Mankato, and obtained the following result from a half-gallon of the water of 124.396 grains, represented in parts of 1,000, viz: Protosulphate of iron and alumine, 32.022 grains; sulphate of lime, 45.928 grains; chloride of sodium, 15.321 grains; sulphate of magnesia, 13.515 grains; silica, 13.025 grains; organic matter, 4.585 grains. Total, 124.396 grains. This water is said to be equal to that of the famous Waukesha springs in medical qualities.

Mr. and Mrs. John Odell of Owatonna celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of their marriage, by a golden wedding.

The residence of Mrs. Dresser, at Northfield which was partially destroyed by fire, was insured for $2,500, $1,700 in the German Insurance company of Freeport, Ill., and $800 in the Home Insurance company of New York.

Prof. Northrup is reported to hesitate about excepting the presidency of the state university on the salary issue, since the removal will necessitate the the sale of his home in New Haven, one of the finest in the city. The tender has been made of a salary of $4,500, but it is believed that $6,000 will be necessary to secure his services.

Judge Brill of St. Paul granted Florance Moody a divorce from Robert Moody, on the grounds of cruel treatment and desertion. He also gives her the custody of her child, $1,300 alimony and her personal property.

Articles of the Sauk Rapids & Mississippi River Boom company, to construct and operate booms on the Mississippi river at Sauk Rapids, to drive and sluice logs, timber, and lumber have been filed with the secretary of state. The office of the company is in Sauk Rapids. The capital stock is $50,000, and the limit of liability $25,000. The incorporators are C. B. Buckman, George W, Benedict, Erasmus Cross, and Joseph Coats, all of Sauk Rapids; Joseph P. Wilson of Minneapolis, H. Oltman, Rice's, Benton county, and S. C. Hall of Muskegon, Mich.

Gov. Hubbard has received a letter from White Cloud, the head chief of the Chippewas—or, as he writes it, the Ojibways—at the White Earth reservation. It expressed the thanks of the chief and the tribe to the governor for his friendly feeling and action in their behalf, and assures him that what he wrote to the commissioner of Indian affairs about the Mille Lacs band was all true, and is in a less degree true of the Leech Lake band. White Cloud writes that "the Ojibway Indians, on account of the rapid and full settlement of the country by the white man, cannot live by hunting."

Norman Buck, formerly of Winona has been appointed associate justice of Idaho.

Minneapolis is asked to adopt the Chicago plan of hiring detectives to assess hidden notes and mortgages.

The Erickson brothers, supposed to be the ones who made the late murderous assault with knives and axes on Samuel Wilson and Fish's camp on the Duluth & Iron Range railroad, waived examination at Duluth and were committed to await trial.
